AN E-BOOK

Your Path to Transformation

Observing makes things simpler

Your Path to Transformation

Observing makes things simpler

Contents

Preface 4

PART 1

CHAPTER 1
Spiritual Awakening" V/S "Spiritual Enlightenment" 8

CHAPTER 2
Relationships 21

CHAPTER 3
Playing your way to transformation 33

CHAPTER 4
A World Full Of Games Surrounds Us At All Times. 46

CHAPTER 5
Physical World's Hidden Games 57

CHAPTER 6
A Metaphysical Perspective On Life's Games 64

CHAPTER 7
In Search Of Higher Intelligence Through Artificial Intelligence 74

PART 2

CHAPTER 8
Harmonizing Urges: A Path to Transformation 88

CHAPTER 9
Managing Anxiety And Insecurity For Transformation 95

CHAPTER 10
Building Lasting Connections for Transformation 108

CHAPTER 11
Ethics And Morals: The Final Basis For Transformation 121

Preface

Observing makes things simpler

I was wondering if God made everything and started with Adam and Eve. Maybe they had kids, and those kids had more kids, and that's how everyone came to be. Had God kept it simpler, like telling Adam and Eve to live together, have some kids, and live for a certain fixed number of years, they would know where to get food, and their kids would have more kids. Then, at a particular time, they would grow old and move on to a different stage of life. Making it completely predictable !

Even in that kind of life, life would be like a game where everyone had a fixed time to live. After that time, they knew they had to go. It was interesting because you had a predefined limit, and you could do your best in that time without wasting it on fights and other things. But in the current game, things are so uncertain that it has become confusing and unpredictable.

Nothing is predictable. There are no predictable behaviors in other people, and no predictable weather or climate.Planet Earth is not predictable.

And living in a way where you're always anxious about what's going to happen next can be stressful. Many people complain about nervousness, of course it's like standing on a ball, planet earth continually moving. Staying steady on that ball is hard because you always think, "What if? What's next?" It's like constantly going, "Aah, oooh, ouch?" when you're on that ball. We have no control over it.

Even though we understand we cannot control it, we still live with that knowledge. We are well aware that we cannot control it. Despite this, we are now trying to control it; we think that we have control over it, even though there is none.

If Whenever your body falls (a person dies), it should be easy. You get another one. There are many things tied to the body when it drops. People say she was this way, he was that way, and this is how they lived. So many stories build up, making it feel like you've lost something super precious. That's how grief increases. But if you keep it simple—just a body dropping, and there will be another one—it might be easier to understand.

I Think about how simple life could be. Our efforts to live seem to revolve around making things permanent, such as an established home with a solid wooden frame that won't collapse, a certificate of citizenship, and looking for durability and stability in all things. Every day we are reminded of the temporary nature of this world.

In relationships, too, we create agreements and try to solidify them by putting them on paper and getting them stamped in front of a judge. It's our way of resisting the temporary nature of the universe and attempting to make things more stable and lasting.

There are two aspects to it. One is trying to prevent it from fading away, which is what we're actively working on. The other attempts to keep it steady, even though it's constantly changing—a continuous, unending transformation. I often say that change is the only constant in this universe.

To deal with this, I do (and perhaps you can try it too) sit alone, observing the entire phenomenon. As I continue to look, it unfolds, revealing its simplicity. The more I observe, the simpler it becomes.

> Thus begins the journey on, "YOUR PATH TO TRANSFORMATION".

Part 1

CHAPTER 1

Spiritual Awakening" V/S "Spiritual Enlightenment"

The words, "spiritual awakening" and "enlightenment" are quite prevalent - prevalent in the sense that they are very common. People use them all the time. But they stay away from the meaning of it. And if we don't know the importance of something, we use it for the sake of discussion or talking to others which deprives us of the pleasure of it. Before, I had already discovered a meaning for it. However, in my journey, I have continued to uncover new meanings. I look at it and consider how I can share these insights with others.

Spiritual awakening is the initial step, while spiritual enlightenment is an ongoing process.

As human beings, we are conscious of our bodies, but sometimes we overlook this awareness. It's like taking a tour of your own body, feeling your left arm, your right arm, your leg, your foot – and you might be amazed because you weren't fully aware that all these body parts are a part of you. During the lockdown, I went for a walk, and as I swung both my arms, I had a moment of realization – I had two arms. I had been so engrossed in work that I hadn't noticed the presence of my own body. Gradually, you become more physically aware of yourself.

Similarly, when it comes to spiritual awareness, understanding that you are a spirit or an energy source is a realization we all possess, but it's often not explored in depth. It's like taking a guided tour where you discover that you are a spiritual energy inhabiting a physical body. This realization is known as spiritual awareness, and it marks the first step, a spiritual awakening. Some people tend to make it a big deal, boasting about being spiritually awakened, while others may regard it as a difficult achievement. Those who reach this stage may even glorify it, claiming uniqueness and superiority over others.I've observed that sometimes, after achieving spiritual awakening, individuals assume the role of a wise teacher and start imparting knowledge to others. I believe this is a common mistake.

When you first attain spiritual awakening, it's like reaching ground zero. At this stage, you become aware of your body, much like realizing you have arms and legs. However, you may not yet fully understand the body's capabilities. These abilities, such as self-healing and cell regeneration, represent the second step.

The second step involves gaining enlightenment about your spiritual self. Enlightenment, in this context, refers to acquiring more knowledge.

"Spiritual awakening is simply realizing that you are a spiritual being. Understanding the capabilities of your spiritual side constitutes spiritual enlightenment".

It's important to note that spiritual awakening is the initial step, while spiritual enlightenment is an ongoing process. You become enlightened to a certain extent, and then you progress to the next level. There are many individuals who have reached the stages of spiritual enlightenment, but there is always more to discover, and the journey of learning continues.

Here is the story of Buddha, who is renowned for sitting under a tree and attaining enlightenment. In my understanding he got spiritually awakened and continued to get enlightenment. However, he didn't end his journey there; instead, he began sharing his wisdom with others. Unfortunately, his teachings were interpreted in numerous ways, leading to the emergence of various sects within Buddhism. This illustrates that even if I were to attain enlightenment, it wouldn't necessarily impact others unless they also experience enlightenment. So, this journey continues because everyone possesses their own wellspring of wisdom. You might be surprised by the wisdom you can find even in unexpected places, like just sitting with a cat or bird watching.

It's fascinating how, even without possessing the same level of cognitive abilities as humans, animals like dogs are incredibly perceptive. They're fully aware of their surroundings, your mood, and what you're doing. This ability to sense and understand amazes me. Every one of us has innate wisdom within us, but often, we just remain away from that wisdom in the sense that we do not own that wisdom.

If we all possess this wisdom, why do we seek external sources to reveal it to us?

When someone listens to a guru or reads a book and exclaims, "I get it," what they're actually doing is recognizing and bringing to the surface their own innate wisdom, which was already there all along.

There exists a conceptual framework known as the KRC triangle, introduced by "Scientology", upon which I have conducted thorough research. In this chapter, we shall delve into this framework. In this model, K denotes knowledge, R signifies responsibility, and C represents control and they all sit on three corners of the triangle.

When you possess knowledge about something, like knowing what will happen in the next hour, it changes your stance. You won't just sit idly because you're already aware of the upcoming events. Instead, you'll spring into action to address the situation. This increased awareness translates into heightened responsibility; you may need to deal with something next door or address your son's actions, and now you must take charge and control the situation. That's the essence of the KRC triangle: knowledge leads to responsibility, which then prompts you to take control.

As a result, it becomes a matter of knowing the game too well. People often say, "I don't know what's going to happen tomorrow," and this allows them to sit in suspense, waiting to see what unfolds. However, enlightenment means that you have a certain level of understanding or knowing.

However, if you only live with certainty or "No," you may lose interest in the game because the essence of a game lies in the unknown. It's the element of unpredictability that keeps you engaged in the game. This is where enlightenment can come to a halt.

> THIS JOURNEY IS FROM UNKNOWN TO KNOWN,

Because supposing this is a spiritual journey where I can say that you find out you will find out completely end to end from where you come to where you go. Everybody says that this is our main question. But if I say okay, we can find the answer, leave everything, let's find the answer. Will people come? No. Though, this is the biggest question they have in their mind, like what is going to happen tomorrow. And if I say, if we can find it out, let's sit down together. Suppose we consider this spiritual journey as a quest to uncover the complete truth about where we come from and where we go. Many people claim that this is their ultimate question. However, if I were to propose "we can find the answer. Leave everything, let's find the answer. Will people come? Surprisingly, No. Even though this question of what is going to happen tomorrow is one of the most pressing in their minds, many might hesitate. Because then the whole knowledge will ruin the purpose of playing this game on planet Earth which is actually a pretend game.

> LET'S PRETEND WE KNOW NOTHING AND THEN TRY TO FIND THE ANSWERS. REMAIN UNSATISFIED WITH ANSWERS SO THAT PRETEND GAME GOES ON!

Furthermore, we tend to believe that this is the only game available to us. We often overlook the fact that there are countless other games waiting to be played in different galaxies and on various planets. Even if we may not wish to participate in these games, the existence of these galaxies and planets is a well-established fact. If one were to take the time to explore the vastness of the universe through platforms like YouTube or simply by studying Planet Earth, their perspective would undergo a significant transformation. They would realize that they are a part of a grand universe, and their current frame of reference, which might be limited to the couch or chair they are sitting on, pales in comparison to the vastness of the cosmos.

The Essence of Enlightenment: Broadening Perspectives and Taking Responsibility

However, if you expand your knowledge, you'll realize that there's a vast universe beyond the concepts of heaven and hell, and you'll consider the presence of various planets around you. This expanded knowledge will transform you, and this transformation is what enlightenment is all about. With this newfound knowledge, your perspective will broaden, leading to a shift in your sense of responsibility and how you approach controlling situations. So, the question remains:

Are you prepared for this transformation? The truth is, most of us are not ready for it.

I had an interesting thought one day when I contemplated the depths of the oceans. As I delved into this thought, I realized how incredibly deep and endless the ocean is as you descend deeper and deeper. This was just a surface-level contemplation, and I hadn't even watched any videos or done any research.

You can try it right now - imagine yourself ascending into space. How far can you go in your imagination? From a perceptual standpoint, you can envision looking up at the sky, feeling like you're ascending higher and higher, and eventually, you might even sense that you're being lifted out of your chair. Then, you can imagine descending, going deeper and deeper into space. This exercise demonstrates the power of knowledge, as it opens up new horizons for exploration.

> THIS OPENS DOORS TO TRANSFORMATION.

And when it is all open, then you are responsible. We created a concept of God, attributing to God the qualities of knowing everything, being responsible for everything, and controlling everything. Then, we distanced ourselves from this concept, believing that it is God's sole responsibility to possess knowledge, exercise control, and bear all responsibilities. Our journey is essentially about becoming more godlike, striving to acquire more knowledge, take on greater responsibilities, and exercise more control.

When we expect predictability in our environment, it should be controlled.

Similarly, let's consider the second word, "control." Control is a term that many people tend to dislike.

One definition of "control" that I've always appreciated is the ability to predict change, where you can foresee what will happen. This definition aligns with the concept of knowledge. I've also come to understand that there are two types of control:

good control and bad control. Good control involves knowing the expected outcome, while bad control is when you are uncertain about the result. Unfortunately, many people often react negatively to control because, for them, all control is perceived as bad.

Usually, when you talk to people, they say, oh, I don't like control, you know, I don't want to control others, I don't want others to control me. So, I ask them you know, everything is predictable, and that is what makes you comfortable. The Sun is predictable, the Moon is predictable, nature is predictable. And that is why you are feeling safe, when there is predictability about the situation. So, if we expect predictability from the environment that we want, it should be controlled.

Usually, when you talk to people, they say they don't want to control others, nor do they want others to control them. But, I point out that predictability is what makes us feel comfortable; we find safety in the predictability of the Sun rising, the Moon's phases, and the arrival of rains.

Therefore, when we expect predictability in our environment, it should be controlled.

The same principle should apply to the business of living. For instance, if you promise your child a chocolate slab but then don't give it to them, it's considered bad control because you didn't remain predictable, and your child may not take you seriously. To maintain predictability, you should either not make the promise or follow through with it, even if it's delayed. This helps the child predict your actions and feel safe with you.

Bad control often occurs when there's a lack of knowledge, such as not being able to control your children because you have less knowledge about them. So, I'm revisiting the triangle concept here. In any situation where you're unable to make decisions or predict changes, it typically indicates a knowledge gap.

When you choose not to control something, you effectively put on blinders and allow life to unfold on its own terms.

What is often lacking is knowledge. Sometimes, gaining knowledge can be painful because you may discover things about your child or your life that you'd rather not know. In response, you might want to avoid gaining that knowledge, claiming that you're not good at control or that you can't handle it.

This also applies to life in general; when you choose not to control something, you effectively put on blinders and allow life to unfold on its own terms.

In our sessions and discussions, what we aim to do is increase the predictability of life. However, if there are areas in your life that you're not yet ready to explore, we ask why you don't want to look at them. Often, the answer is fear. So, we delve into the source of that fear, and as we confront it, the fear dissipates, opening up new areas for exploration. This spiritual journey doesn't follow a predefined path with milestones telling you where you are; instead, it's a gentle progression where you ensure your stability and check if there's still solid ground beneath your feet. It's a journey within the spiritual universe, not limited to the physical world's constraints.

> SHEDDING YOUR FEARS LITTLE BY LITTLE LEADS TO TRANSFORMATION.

Not being ready to know more.

I've had conversations with numerous people, both before and after a significant incident in my life. We often say that we know unexpected things can happen at any time, but we're not truly prepared for it. I've always lived in the moment, especially when it comes to saying goodbye to loved ones. I've often thought, "This might be the last time we see each other," and encouraged people to come in and talk instead of rushing off. Now that I've experienced such an incident, it has intensified my journey to discover more about what happens beyond. If you inquire with many people, they might express the desire to know more, but they'll also admit that they're not ready. There's a hint of fear in not being ready. However, if you know more, your predictability, your control will increase, you will live life in a different way. As you will value every moment.

And that will increase the control of life. Until we're prepared to take on the unpredictable, we won't be able to see it, which is when we will switch from this unpredictable universe to one that is predictable.

But we are not ready to look at that moment. As a result, we reduce the predictability in life. We don't take control of the situations; we are just too scared to have things under our control. So, this is the relationship between control and knowledge.

This is an extreme example, but the point I'm making is that when you say something like, "I'm going to kill you," and then apologize, saying, "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to say that," it still increases predictability about your emotional state. It becomes evident that you weren't in a good mood when you said it, even though you didn't mean it. The key here is making things known. This illustrates the relationship between knowledge and control. When you say something but don't mean it, the person you're talking to gains knowledge about your emotional state. They begin to understand the unpredictable you. Children, in particular, are very perceptive in this regard. They can tell when you're in a bad mood and might say things you don't mean, and sometimes they take advantage of that knowledge because they know you're just saying it in the heat of the moment.

So, this is an unsaid understanding that goes on between people; people understand each other. And they do control each other, but in a different way.

It's like I can control you by throwing tantrums because I know I can control you. In those moments, you tend to say, "Okay, okay, what do you want?" Everyone does it, although perhaps not consciously. What I am saying is that Knowledge leads to predictability and peace of mind, which makes you work better and make better decisions.

When you try to resolve an issue and it doesn't work, you're missing something.

Suppose you find yourself stuck in a situation where you feel like something is missing, but you keep going in circles with the information you have, and no result is forthcoming. In such cases, it often means you need more information. Sometimes, I ask people what they've decided, and they respond with, "Give me two or three days, I'll come back to you." I inquire about what they plan to do during those two or three days. Do they need more information? I can provide it right away to help them make a decision. They might say, "No, I'll ask my friend." I then ask if their friends are specialists in the field, and usually, they are not. So, I break it down for them and say, "Here's how it is. This is the positive side, and this is the negative side. You can decide if you want to go forward with it or not. I can also show you the references and explain how it all works." Then, they often say, "Okay, I'm ready to proceed," whether it's related to immigration, creating a website, having sessions, or any other decision. Sometimes, a single piece of information can clear the confusion or fog in your mind, just like when I read books or listen to someone, and one single word can make everything crystal clear.

I recently worked with a couple dealing with alcoholism, which is not an easy addiction to overcome. People often struggle with it. On the first day, I simply listened to her without saying anything. She shared how challenging it was to deal with alcoholism and how it had caused conflicts between them. I casually suggested, "Don't fight, just be an alcoholic!." This simple suggestion had a profound impact. Instead of being an alcoholic, she transitioned into becoming a social drinker. The ownership of being an alcoholic increased her responsibility and she cut down on the consumption. Knowledge increases responsibility. That's what happens when you have all the information. In the case of an issue that cannot be resolved, it means you are missing something. Don't keep going in circles on your own; seek external help, whether it's from a book, a YouTube video, or another source. You'll find a solution faster because sometimes, when you're struggling, it means you don't have the right tool.

You will not be able to accomplish your goal if you are using the wrong tool to solve a problem. Knowledge and control are interrelated, and that's what makes them work. Transform from where you are by gaining more knowledge.

The better we understand where we are headed and where we've come from, the better prepared we are to cope with this ongoing drama.

> TRANSFORMATION NEEDS KNOWLEDGE, RESPONSIBILITY AND CONTROL.

CHAPTER 2

Relationships

Now, let's talk about relationships. We're all in various relationships, whether it's with a partner, siblings, or others; we coexist with people. In today's world, there seems to be a lack of confidence and trust in relationships because there's often unpredictability about them. You're unsure if a relationship will always stand by you or change. As a result, it's crucial for each party to have a complete understanding of the other. You cannot have a strong relationship without that knowledge.

But if you keep saying, "I can't trust her," or "I'm not sure about the nature of our relationship," it means there's missing knowledge about each other. Once you fully understand each other, you can coexist confidently. You become certain about each other. When you compare a weak or weaker relationship with a stronger one, which one provides more comfort?

The missing part in a weak relationship is the lack of shared knowledge.

We lack the knowledge, and seeking that knowledge might be painful. In order to establish a good relationship, you might need to say something to someone that they won't like, something that could be very painful, embarrassing, or shameful for them to hear. But once you share it, those emotions are released, your bond becomes lighter and stronger. It may not always be entertaining; in fact, it might be boring or challenging. However, what you gain from exchanging knowledge can be interesting, entertaining, and ultimately more pleasurable.

There is a lot of confusion and fear surrounding the concept of responsibility because many people tend to shy away from it. They say, "I'm not responsible; you are," or "I can't handle that much responsibility." These reactions often come from misunderstandings and fears surrounding the word itself. Your capacity for taking on responsibility can grow if you gently address and remove these barriers, rather than peel them off like layers of onion.

Similarly, trying to discover where we're headed, where we came from, and what this ongoing drama is all about requires seeking knowledge

What I have observed is that there are certain things you do not want to know about. For instance, you do not want to know what your children are doing. You do not want to know how your next decade is going to be or what kinds of sicknesses you might invite. You actively avoid these things. All the things you do want to know, or that you want to keep at bay, require some energy or effort to keep them from coming to your attention. You deliberately keep them away. If you don't, they might unexpectedly confront you.

I found myself in that same phase. I didn't want to know about sickness, death, misery, or pain because I believed there was so much beauty in the world to explore. Why waste time on painful knowledge? However, I realized that my avoidance meant I was afraid of all those things and not prepared to confront them. I thought that if I don't free myself from the fear of the unknown, I will not be able to learn more.

The fear of the unknown takes away lots of your attention. You do not have enough free attention to know more because you are trying to keep something away. This is not generally possible because if you push something behind, it just comes forward. You have to put in more and more effort to push it behind. As a result, your effort is to remain happy.

Why do people always want to have fun? Because they're trying to avoid pain. Their effort is all the time focused on having fun, eating food, going here, going there. What are they avoiding? They're avoiding pain or boredom; they're not facing it. Similarly, not knowing something is a choice. You know there is a fear, there can be a choice of what I want to know or what I don't want to know.

Anybody who is seeking the ultimate truth, in any shape or form but is running away from a minor truth, means he/she will run away from the major truth as well.

The fear of knowing needs to be removed in order for us to progress in our journey, and whatever we are trying to accomplish; knowing will bring responsibility and if you have to take responsibility, you have to do something about it. Without action, you limit your effectiveness.

But you must see how you are limiting yourself.

By avoiding issues that children might bring, you are lessening yourself as a mother and robbing yourself of the pleasure of motherhood as a parent who doesn't know what their children are doing. In other words, it's like walking carefully through a narrow tunnel in your head. As soon as you open up to something that is causing fear, your fear dissipates as it confronts you face-to-face. Taking responsibility for it becomes easier. The exact same thing happens during our sessions. The more we explore and understand it further, the more free we become from its snares.

As with everything, there is always a limit to how much you can know. The path to all-knowingness can be built up by asking yourself,

" What do I want to avoid knowing?".

The theme of this book revolves around our shared curiosity. We have gathered here to delve into the mysteries of existence. Our quest is to uncover the secrets of returning to the home universe and to gain a deeper understanding of the concept of God.

This journey will be incomplete if, in your immediate environment, you are not taking all the necessary actions. Every aspect of your immediate environment needs to be taken care of.

What causes people to hide? They hide because they are afraid to share. Getting closer, being genuine, and being patient are all things you need in order to learn from them. It may not be possible for them to reveal everything in one day, but you have to be patient to find out. In the case of individuals concealing things from you, they may distance themselves and begin looking for faults with you. The fact that they find fault with you is a significant indicator that they are concealing something from you. In simple terms, if someone finds fault with you, you should inquire, "What is it that you are hiding from me?"

There are matters that are none of your business. If a child values their privacy and keeps something personal and private, that's their right. However, if you are directly involved or part of the situation, that's when you need to be aware. Because now, all their reactions and behavior are influenced by that undisclosed aspect. You may discover it, and it's not as if I'm advising you; as a mother, you naturally become aware because they're avoiding eye contact and not engaging in conversation with you. Yet, you choose to ignore it. So, while this is a minor example, it serves as one illustration.

The same is true in relationships when someone is wasting time and doesn't want you to be aware of it. This, too, is a minor matter they prefer to keep hidden. So, it's a mechanism, not a matter of size; it's about the mechanism itself. Transitioning from this mechanism, we move on to the next aspect, which is responsibility – the ability to respond. Responsibility, response, and the ability to respond.

As a result, the less you know, the less control you have over things, and your ability to respond gradually diminishes. Responsibility has evolved into a substantial term over time, and it tends to provoke reactions. When you mention taking responsibility, people might retort with, "Why should I take responsibility? I'm not to blame." This word is often misunderstood because I've framed it as your capacity to respond to something. The less you can control a situation, the less you know about it, and it causes you to refrain from responding to certain circumstances. Consider the example of a mother concealing things from her children; in doing so, she refrains from responding. This incapacity will eventually manifest in her life, causing her to miss out on the fullness of the human experience to some extent.

Consider the case of someone bullying you, and you fail to take responsibility for handling the situation effectively. This implies that you are not adequately responding to the bullying. Will the issue simply disappear? No, it won't.

Moreover, because you didn't respond initially, over time, your ability to respond diminishes, while the bully becomes more entrenched in their behavior because nobody is intervening. So, when the bully escalates their actions and you claim, "I'm not responsible; that's just how they are," remember that at some point, you failed to take responsibility for curbing their behavior in a manner they could understand. This brings us to the concept of first responders. They promptly arrive at the scene where they are needed and are trained to appropriately handle the situation.

Now, suppose you are attempting to repair a relationship and take responsibility for it. If you misjudge the extent of effort needed to fix it, and you only make a minor attempt, you may find yourself unable to resolve the issues. In such a situation, you might say, "I tried, but it's not working out." This happens when there is not a complete understanding, no total control, and thus, no total responsibility.

Now, let's consider the concept of God. What does it entail? God is described as all-knowing; He possesses knowledge of everything, controls everything, and assumes responsibility for everything happening in the world. This is the journey we are embarking upon – seeking to comprehend everything, striving to bring about change, and embracing full responsibility.

This dynamic occurs in all relationships, but it becomes especially apparent in close relationships, such as with children. When someone expresses concern about understanding them, I counter by suggesting that not knowing can be even scarier because you're left in the dark about what's to come.

So, as you embark on your journey to self-discovery, you must anticipate resistance. You'll need to peel away the layers of your own onion gradually. You cannot expect to address everything in a single day; it must be done layer by layer, addressing only what you can handle at a given time. This layer-by-layer approach is essential because, as a reminder, people don't become who they are in a single day; it happens over time. Sometimes, in malls, you witness parents shouting at their children, hoping for an instant transformation. However, it's crucial to understand that change doesn't happen instantly.

That's precisely how you've brought yourself to this point. Now, the challenge lies in whether you are willing to invest the necessary patience and effort to make it right. The question that arises is, "Is it worth it?" Why is it worth it? The worthiness comes from the understanding that, regardless of the context, without certain knowledge, you remain trapped in a perpetual loop of life and death.

Consider being in a closed room with just one door and your eyes tightly shut. Without knowing the door's location, you'll keep going in circles, repeatedly missing the way out. Our quest is to discover that exit door.

To find this door, you may need to proceed cautiously, meticulously examining every wall to ensure you don't overlook it.

This process is akin to peeling an onion layer by layer. At my personal level, I sought to understand what I might be avoiding. Fortunately, I recognized my capacity to comprehend everything, and thus, I embarked on a journey to explore.

I wanted to determine whether I could perceive fully without relying on my physical eyes. Could I possess the certainty to see even when my eyes were closed? I'd heard of individuals who possessed this ability. Additionally, I yearned to investigate whether I could consciously exit my physical body, traverse freely, and subsequently return. These questions were the foundation of my quest.

Then I see that there are some fears of the unknown. For instance, I wonder if I go out of the body, will I be able to return? Then I contemplated, perhaps I should venture a little further out, gradually expanding my experiences. You see, this is an uncharted field. Even if I were to describe going out of the body, I wouldn't be able to provide concrete proof to you. This will remain a deeply personal experience for me. Nonetheless, these are the abilities I might aspire to attain, as they represent the initial steps into the metaphysical realm—a world that is both unknown and unseen.

What is crucial is the fear of not knowing about certain things; that fear is significant. Thus, there are areas you're not yet prepared to explore because they might cause you distress. You're resisting them. It's not imperative to have exhaustive knowledge about everyone or everything, such as what Trump might be thinking. That's of little importance to me. However, it's the fear of not knowing what he's doing that troubles you, and you prefer to avoid it. Consequently, your next journey may become challenging because you're apprehensive about delving deeper. These are the stumbling blocks, as you can discern.

Consider this scenario: if you wish to learn something about me, but initially, you avoid the topic. You're afraid that asking me certain questions might upset me. Let's use this as an example. However, one day, you mustered the courage to sit beside me and say, "I have a question." Your heart may be racing, and your hands might be sweaty, whatever sensations you experience. But you gather your courage and ask, "I have this question." Then I look at you and declare that I'm unwilling to answer this question. At this point, you can inquire, "If you don't wish to answer this question, will it impact me? Am I involved in it?" You can pose all sorts of questions, even though initially, it might be a bit challenging. Over time, we'll reach an understanding. It may turn out that there are certain things I prefer not to share with you, but they are unrelated to you. Your fear regarding those matters concerning me will dissipate.

Similarly, if you plan to embark on a road trip or any endeavor, understanding the directions is essential. When someone informs me that they lack knowledge about the directions, I encourage them to exercise their judgment. Then, I inquired, "Have you been there before?" If they respond affirmatively, saying, "Yes, I have been there, and it's quite dangerous, scary, or whatever you perceive," you can gather that knowledge and proceed with caution. Having some preparation is crucial. Consequently, resisting the urge to seek knowledge won't contribute to enhancing one's spiritual path. This resistance impedes progress from one stage to the next due to a fear of change.

I've observed numerous individuals who are hesitant to alter even the arrangement of their room. Fear of change pervades their lives. They avoid changing jobs or relocating to a different city. It's not a matter of choice for them; they're simply afraid to do so. This marks the distinction. Are you anxious that leaving your current job may leave you unemployed? If so, then it's essential to examine that fear. Because, as I mentioned, if that fear hinders you, you're not ready for change. Control entails predictable change.

Furthermore, there's a lack of awareness at this stage. It manifests primarily through physical reactions in the body, accompanied by emotional sensations, although not felt emotionally. The subsequent stage involves experiencing emotions initially. However, when you don't pay attention, the emotions dissipate, leaving only bodily sensations. For instance, anxiety manifests as physical symptoms: trembling hands and restlessness. When asked what's wrong, you might respond, "I don't know; nothing happened, but my hands are shaking." I once worked with someone going through menopause who attributed her experiences to hot flashes. However, during our sessions, I noticed that whenever she brought up aa sensitive topic, she would engage in certain behaviors and claim to have experienced another hot flash. I suggested that what she was experiencing resembled anxiety attacks more than hot flashes. She acknowledged having them multiple times a day because she was grappling with anxiety. In such instances, individuals might experience chills or hot flashes. Notably, not everyone going through menopause encounters hot flashes, although it is commonly associated with the condition. Nevertheless, it doesn't affect everyone in the same way. Thus, these reactions can also be attributed to emotional restlessness, emotional reactions, or even hunger. Some people overeat when confronted with change, unsure of the cause of their altered behavior. Others may experience sleep disturbances. All of these are physical reactions.

Returning to the main focus of our discussion, responsibility, it's crucial that our ability to respond approaches 100% and aligns with the appropriate response.

So, if your fear can go away without knowing a lot of things, that's okay. But if, the next day, you realize that you got rid of the fear and then something happens that you should have known about, but you didn't take responsibility for it, there's something you know inside you that you can ignore. Then you can say, "I can get rid of the fear without having to learn everything." And if something does happen, you can say, "I didn't see it coming."

Therefore, you must be prepared to assume responsibility for the outcome, whether it is favorable or unfavorable. This can also be one approach, but then you will progress. So, each time you recognize that you must make these decisions. If you're not making these choices, then you are in a state of stagnation, and that impedes your progress. That is the underlying concept here. So, the questions I had were: What is it that I don't wish to comprehend? What am I fearful of understanding, or what do I aspire to understand? I also contemplated over the past week on this entire human drama we are participating in on planet Earth, where we have different nations. It's a compelling drama. In this drama, there is perpetually a duality, with two opposing forces such as good and evil, God and the devil, day and night, sweet and salty, pleasure and pain. That's where we engage in the game.

It is often said that one should always strive to be a virtuous person, perpetually seek pleasure, and endeavor to emulate godliness. Everything is framed in reference to its counterpart, not to embody malevolence but to encompass goodness, not to mirror the devil but to emulate God. This is how our world, this drama, is forged within a dichotomy. Therefore, our triumph lies in being entirely at ease with comprehending the duality of existence and then operating from that perspective.

Much like the audience, in order to appreciate the drama, they must have comprehensive knowledge, absolute responsibility, and full control over the elements, because without that, they would be unable to relish the spectacle.

It has been remarked by someone that a commendable actor is one who can immerse themselves in a role and seamlessly transition in and out of character in a mere twenty-fifth of a second.

Hence, don't become the character; instead, be the actor. This is a continuous process. The more you observe, the more you learn. And it's only when you reflect on your journey, that you realize you have progressed. It offers its own satisfaction. It's not for anyone else; it's for your own gratification. The more you learn, the more liberated you become.

CHAPTER 3

Playing your way to transformation

Let us integrate playfulness into everything we do to make it engaging, imaginative, and novel.

What practical ways can we incorporate the game into our daily lives? Every action we take during the day is a game, and taking the game too seriously detracts from the enjoyment of life. Lessen the significance of existence. Give it a sense of excitement.

There are a lot of people who plan their lives very carefully, but they miss playing the game. Routines, instead, take control of their lives. A simple walk becomes a timed task for some people who are extremely regimented with their calendars and timers. A sense of play and enjoyment should permeate the game.

To play the game, you should refrain from introducing seriousness; if you turn it into a discipline and become too serious about it, it loses the essence of being a game. A game is characterized by playfulness, "the spirit of play." Even in our daily routines, consider changing the dynamics. For instance, today, you might explore a different place and spend time with someone new, adding a touch of variety to your routine. Because if you keep going to the same person almost every day or maybe every weekend, how many weekends will you enjoy that? What creativity can you bring so that it keeps you challenged, interested, and motivated?

If we look around, so many people have stopped playing the game. They don't play any games; they live the burden of life. When asked about their well-being, they say, "It's going okay." The vibrancy is low. Therefore, the lesson is to learn how to transform a familiar lifestyle by injecting the element of play into it.

Try incorporating something you find challenging into your daily routine, like yoga. Practice it until you can master that specific asana, infusing the element of a game. Similarly, in cooking, add creativity by setting challenges—decide to cook something new for the day, turning it into a game. Embrace the endless possibilities that await you. “Keep your eye on the mountain," goes the slogan. Keep in mind that life is a game, no matter how many diversions or distractions you face.

It does not matter what the final payoff is. The fun and games will be lost in the pursuit of rewards.

Many people take things seriously and find it hard to laugh. They often have strict criteria for humor, only finding something funny if it meets a certain standard. The simplicity of life doesn't please them. They must have a significant shift in attitude towards life.

No matter what unfolds in life, the music should continue to play.

Here's another compelling example that I'd like to discuss today—a moment that was truly life-changing for me. It happened when I attended an orchestra performance, an experience I might have shared previously. Picture this: 102 individuals seamlessly play in harmony. You can find soulful symphonies on YouTube, showcasing musicians playing together in perfect unison. Observing the orchestra members, it's evident that each one is a master, demonstrating perfection in their craft. Attaining such a skill level and being selected to play in a symphony with these world-renowned groups is undoubtedly no easy feat.

Their teamwork in playing together is admirable, though. There is an effort by none to dominate the other. You can see this reflected in nature as well; everything in nature is harmoniously balanced. All is balanced and organized, with the seasons following in a predictable pattern and the sun and moon following their predictable cycles. Without human interference, nature maintains its delicate equilibrium and is thus predictable.

No matter what happens, music should remain. That was a great lesson. Envision a verbal duel between two people, with each side doing its best to win the argument. But it is pointless if harmony music dies out in the middle of all this. Even if you win the argument, it won't bring true beauty or satisfaction. Remaining in harmony when the other person plays involves adapting your tune to theirs to ensure the music persists.

Defining music as an expression of beauty that is pleasing and agreeable.

That's the lesson I drew from the performance of those 102 musicians playing together. Sometimes you have an "aha" moment. This concert was by Ilaiyaraaja, a South Indian musician and a natural-born composer who never attended formal school. During the four-and-a-half-hour program, conducted entirely in Tamil and Telugu, he brought 102 musicians. Looking at the orchestra it struck me that no matter how skilled an individual is, without others playing alongside, there is no music. Even if one produces excellent music, without someone listening, there is no actual music.

During the program, I sought to understand the role of the conductor, Ilaiyaraaja. Despite having notations in front of them, I wondered about his contribution. Upon reading the sequence, I realized that the composer is someone else who has written the composition and provided it to all the musicians. Each musician has their notes to play. The conductor, in this case, Ilaiyaraaja, understands the composer's concept and brings in the soul—the writer's message. All the musicians then play their part. The journey starts with the composer, the conductor understands it, the musicians play together, and this experience is transmitted to the audience without alteration.

This illustrates how the game should be—a win-win situation for all involved parties. The music should not fade away amidst conflicts or warlike problems.

In playing the game, the focus should be on maintaining harmony, no matter what it takes.

Let's consider this example again: a man asked a woman to put her dog on the leash, and she lost her temper and picked up the fight, resulting in calling cops. When the woman was aggressive the man should have lowered his tone so that music should have existed in their disagreement. However, in an orchestra, the musicians respond by playing lower notes, allowing the loud sound to be absorbed, preserving the overall music. If one learns to change their attitude, the focus should be on maintaining harmony, no matter what it takes.

Likewise, during a walk, the emphasis is on enjoying the pleasure that the walk brings and maintaining a spirit of play rather than worrying about calories burned or how fast one is walking.

It's a beautiful lesson to learn, and once you grasp it, every moment becomes full of beauty— an expression of beauty.

Beauty, which has no bounds, keeps on expanding.

Positive emotions also seem boundless. As mentioned earlier, there's a holy sense of pleasure for the soul. The word "happy" is just one definition, but as you delve into the nuances of this emotion, happiness keeps expanding. The term "happy" becomes insufficient to convey the depth of your feelings, leading you to say, "I'm cheerful" or "I'm exhilarated." You find the need for more words to express the richness of your emotions, and this is what beauty is— beauty keeps on expanding.

Similarly, negative emotions, when examined, seem to have no end. In a state of depression, one descends lower and lower, crying to the point of feeling like you might die. Eventually, you may feel detached from your body. I'm focusing on these words because this is what a game should embody. Any game's goal should be music/harmony and beauty. Regardless of the game you engage in, there has to be an element of fun. That's the essence of the spirit of play.

If the working on the soil is a game for the farmer, and he sees beauty in it. And then the same is true for the artist who plays with his instruments. For both of them, that is everything; they worship their instruments. They wake up and immediately start practicing; they even practice in their sleep.

What they get out of it is beauty, beauty, which has no bounds, keeps on expanding.

What makes some audience members enjoy the orchestra more than others? Is there a reason for this?

Here is a very profound observation I would like to make about this difference: God's creation is universally the same for everyone. However, the receivers differ. When an audience sits there with their filters, the above happens. Most of them are very judgmental. They are judging it to some other level of perfection. They're not happy with it. Some are not there in the present time; they're somewhere else. And so, their attention is entirely out. We all have different glasses and view the same thing differently. While the truth is the same, our perception is different.

When we are playing a game, we need to check our filters. A filter refers to a way of observing something.

That brings us to another aspect: we need to check our filters when playing a game. A filter refers to a way of observing something. Let me share a personal example. I had the filter that my son was "my son," and "I've done so much for him," "This is how I've brought him up." I looked at it as if he had become how I perceived it. I viewed him through the lens of being his mother.

Consequently, whenever I tried to guide him, I did so from my perspective – how he should be based on my perception of life. I never saw him as an individual. Our relationship didn't become stronger because he was falling short and acknowledged that he couldn't meet my expectations. The moment I decided to be myself, not just his mother, and let him be who he was, our relationship became beautiful.

He understood me effortlessly, and I didn't have to exert so much effort in our conversations. Previously, when I spoke, all the emotions about what I had done for him and what he was doing in return would surface. The same dynamics existed, but I wasn't seeing it for what it was. What did I do? I removed my glasses of being his mother.

In a game when we are playing or picking a game, we must take off our glasses and clean them; maybe they need more clarity. And that's why we are not enjoying it.

When I'm talking about God's realization, people have so many filters about God. Everybody has created their kind of God, and they think that is the real kind of God. So, with their own eyes, they have made this image. In my journey, I felt that He is so much a part of you that only you are not seeing Him. He's so close to you, but you're not genuinely seeing Him because of your preconceived notions about how He should be. Similarly, the truth is so simple and right in front of your face that you can't even face it. You have so many filters through which you need to look at the truth so that you can face it.

So, that was another aspect of playing the game. Whatever game you're engaged in, it's crucial to thoroughly examine the filters through which you're viewing the same game.

If you have these filters in front of your eyes, "That I'm so and so. I studied from this school and that college. I'm somebody's son; we have a great heritage. We don't do things like this. I'm born with a silver spoon." These filters make your abilities less effective in various situations because you have already decided who you are and who you cannot be. That disrupts the symphony within you. Symphony is always there.

I strongly encourage you to watch soulful symphonies on YouTube. You'll observe that all the sounds they're playing, they're very basic sounds taken from nature. The music can be so low that it is barely audible but still some. That's the hum or the OM sound going around always, barely audible.

So, the symphony is always there, truth is always there, beauty is always there, but you are away from it-

Check the games you're playing: Are they your choices or others' expectations?

One should evaluate the games they are playing. And once you evaluate, you can leave or have those games.. The middle class is the class that holds hands together and tight. And they want to live together and don't want anything to change. The middle class is a class that wants more security and stability because they believe- "this is how things are, this is how things should be." There is what is the middle-class mentality. So, you have to check whether the games you're playing are your choice or which others choose, and you're just trying to fit in those shoes. When you try to go in those shoes, like you, one should get married, one should get married at this age, and marriage should continue. So, all these are the pre-defined games we are trying to play. And maybe you're winning in those. So, you evaluate those games, and then you can move out of those games.

A human being is just the body. Being is different, and human beings are different. That human being is this race where we are being human. And a being is somebody who is just coming life after life.

Recognizing lifelong connections and cycles shaping experiences.

I said because human beings if you talk about genetics, the genetics are in the body; you take morphology, or you might take some physiology, but psychology, in that literal word, or your behavior or your response to certain situations, is coming from the life continuum. Life after life, we are just bringing those things. This provides insight into why siblings can exhibit stark personality differences despite growing up in the same household and may even become adversaries. The key lies in understanding that their interactions and relationships extend beyond the scope of a single lifetime; they are part of a recurring cycle, each existence building upon the experiences and dynamics of previous lives.

They are all in the same environment but have unique personalities and capabilities. A few people are more adaptable; that is their personality trait. They live in the house, absorbing everything that happens and avoiding conflicts. On the other hand, some individuals resist accepting things as they are; they remain adamant. This highlights the role of filters—your willingness to acknowledge and absorb information or experiences. For instance, a teacher imparts knowledge in a classroom setting, but some students absorb it quickly while others struggle to learn. Our recordings or filters influence these variations, shaped by how we've been brought up, lifetime after lifetime. Allow me to share a personal example. As the eldest in my family, I was a sensitive child. Consequently, I developed nervousness, especially when faced with scolding.

Seek understanding beyond convenient answers; delve into the complexity of responses.

And then, I would coil within myself, experiencing all those typical reactions that kids often do. However, my brother responded differently; he started rebelling in similar situations. As we grew older and discussed our experiences, he shared that he used to be very nervous, avoiding coming home and thinking there might be something wrong at home. The pattern he adopted was one of rebellion. Our pursuit is not merely about finding answers that satisfy us conveniently but about understanding the complexity of responses. It's not about fitting simple solutions like pieces of a puzzle; it's about recognizing the intricate nature of our experiences. When the fear dissipated, he became calmer, as it did for my brother. In my case, once my anxiety diminished, I adopted a more rebellious stance. Reflecting on it now, I realize I shouldn't have suppressed my rebellious tendencies earlier. This illustrates how we acquire different abilities through our experiences. I share this to emphasize the significance of examining our filters. When we scrutinize them, they begin to dissolve, and once the filter is gone, it doesn't return. This is the beauty of the process—once you look, understand, and let go, it's gone for good.

Whatever is stopping you from experiencing the symphony is your filter.

How Do You Know that You Are Not Experiencing a Symphony?

Because if you don't feel on top of the world, and you're not living in that exalted state we just discussed, you should realize that you are missing something.

Because, as I mentioned, there is a degree to beauty—it keeps increasing, endlessly expanding. When you start going up, there is no defined limit to it. After some time, you become an explorer. Sometimes, your filters make you agreeable to your answers, but once those filters are gone, you become an explorer, eager to discover more. And even then, you want to experience more, you want to know more.

Consider nature; nature is not stable; it is ever-changing. Sometimes, people think of life as a constant—either you're going up or down. If you're not going up, then it is 100 percent certain that you are going down. Sometimes, people ask me, "Does that mean it is a constant effort, and you should keep trying to go up?" He replied, "Living is a constant effort; you have to breathe in every time. Can you say that I have been breathing for all these years? I'm not going to breathe anymore. That's too much."

So, that's how there is a distinction between these games. The tagline, the answer to everything, says, "The only richness is understanding." You see yourself at this level of understanding, and then you see the next level of understanding, and then the next level of understanding. And every level is beautiful.

My answers will not be your answers. When I'm talking, it's not from books. That is what is very satisfying to me. Because, at some point, it was always from the books. But then, I don't know how many years I stopped reading books because I just wanted to experience it first-hand. And then it keeps coming, and after that, if I ever read a book, I say, "Yes, he's talking the same thing." So, once I was watching Deepak Chopra's video, and of course, it could have been more straightforward. When I heard it, I related precisely what he was talking about, but then I thought, "You are using such a ton of words to explain that, not even getting the audience to accept it or not." My goal now is to make it as simple as possible so that people should not be deprived of those pleasures and should not think that they are incapable. Everybody is capable if you present it in a way that others can have it., That's my game- to make it simple and straightforward. So, coming back to this game's last tagline is- you will always be in the game.

So, it is up to you whether you want to pick your games or continue to play the games picked by others or the games you are forced to play. You can decide accordingly.

When you gain knowledge about yourself, you start becoming richer; your understanding increases and expands.

For example, when you don't have money in your pocket, you eat whatever you get. And when you start making money, you start becoming picky about food- "I want to eat this, or I want to eat that."

So, the richer you become, the simpler you start becoming. You go to the five- and seven-star hotels, and then you see the food they start giving you is more straightforward. Very little rice; they will put two leaves of something, and the rate will be so high. The plate will cost, say, $500, something like that. But then, at that time, it was not just about the food; it was about the whole ambiance of that place. You're sitting there, and then you're enjoying that. With a stable state of mind, in case you're feeling rich, not like even if you're still feeling poor, your attention is on money. Similarly, when you gain this much knowledge about yourself, you become richer; your understanding increases and expands. So, your games keep changing.

How to get out of a game that another person creates? How to experience more freedom and pleasure?

You have to ask yourself, when did you agree to play that game? So, if you look at all the spots of your agreement, and you examine them, after some time, they start disappearing, and then you are out of that game.

I was sharing an experience from when I was new to America. In India, people are often very conservative, doing things based on what others might think. I went to a store, and there was a black woman and her daughter. She was shopping, and suddenly the music changed. Maybe that song was the lady's favorite, and she stopped shopping before me. She just danced there, in the aisle. I was new to this and thought, "Wow, is this how black women are?" It added another layer of filtering on top of my other filters. The freedom of expression was also restricted. Sometimes, I feel so much happiness or beauty that I want to dance, not caring about who is watching because you have to come down by dancing—let some energy go out, and then you will settle down. That's how you experience more freedom and pleasure as you keep removing filters.

CHAPTER 4

A World Full Of Games Surrounds Us At All Times.

Everyone has a definition for the word "game" because we are interested in various kinds of games. We play games for recreational purposes, and as we grow up, we continue playing games. There's always an element of the unknown in games, which we strive to overcome. This unknown factor keeps us engaged and invested in the game. As we conquer this unknown aspect of the game, we ultimately emerge as winners. This is the essence of a game. Games maintain our interest in life.

There are games that we choose to play, much like our choice to study. This, too, is a game. Initially, we might not know much about the subject, but as we learn and overcome the various barriers, we feel a sense of accomplishment. Gradually, we become masters of the game. However, once we achieve mastery, the game loses its appeal because there are no more barriers left to overcome. At this point, we often choose another game to play. I've observed many individuals who reach the pinnacle of their careers, only to find that they have no opponents left to challenge them. In response, they leave that game and embark on a new one. Games, in essence, involve an unknown factor or a barrier that we aim to overcome. Once we succeed, the game concludes. As we age, we become familiar with many games. We've played the game of making money and achieved financial stability by overcoming various obstacles that threatened our stability.

However, there are times when we find ourselves in a state of "game-lessness," which can be equated with boredom. In such moments, there is nothing new or unknown to challenge us. In less developed countries, people often engage in games born out of necessity, such as navigating flooded roads. The system presents numerous barriers, and individuals are occupied with solving these challenges. In contrast, in developed countries, the number of such games dwindles, and people may experience a sense of "game-lessness." They may resort to engaging in unconventional activities, such as drinking, drug use, or extra-marital affairs. These actions introduce hidden factors and secrets into their lives, creating a new form of game that is played in secrecy.

Some games are chosen by us, while others are imposed upon us.

There are also games from our past that we continue to play, even after we've lost. Suppose you were employed somewhere, and then that place, the place of employment, wasn't good, and it was pretty humiliating or disturbing so you moved out of that place. Nevertheless, in your mind, you still play a game with the boss or your superior who humiliated you. He becomes your opponent, and you continue to play a game against him. You still search the internet and find out what happened to him. Is he still in that company? Has he been laid off? You continue to play a game with him. And if you forget about him, you pick a person with similar behavior or something, and you set up a game with that person—an authority figure or the new senior—and you end up fighting with that person. It's the same game because this is the game that interests you, and it involves having an opponent.

You will always play games

The bottom line is that you will always play games. You cannot be without a game. If you understand that, consider the games you are playing, whether you are winning or losing them, and then decide whether to leave that game or aim to win it.

Suppose you have a roommate, and then you both have entered a game condition known as a "game condition." This game condition involves you disturbing his life, and he's disturbing your life. On purpose or without purpose, you are just hurting each other. Even when you go to the office and are doing your work, your attention is still on your roommate, thinking about what he might have done. Today, when I go in the evening, I'm going to tell him that this is not going to work. So, what I'm saying is that it might seem like you're playing the game of life— you go to the office and follow your normal routine. It looks like that is your real game. However, sometimes that is not your real game because, at a deeper level, you are busy fighting with somebody, perhaps a past enemy or someone in your current life, and that's what keeps your attention all the time. When You're deeply engrossed in something, that is your game.

What keeps you occupied are things you know by heart, tasks you can do automatically. For example, driving a car is no longer a game because you've mastered it. When you were unable to drive and were learning it every day, it was your game. Now, when you're driving the car, there are numerous thoughts swirling in your head, and you're fixated on something or the other—that becomes your game. A game takes away a significant portion of your attention as you're engrossed in the questions and answers it presents.

Take, for instance, a very successful person who gets involved in an affair with someone. He is carrying out all the normal functions of his life, but he's always thinking about that affair. In this affair, the other person is bothering him, and this person is not fighting all his battles professionally; he's allowing this affair to make him feel sad or low. So, this is the game this professional is playing, and that's his profession; it's not his game because he can easily handle it. People keep a game that keeps them interested, one that provides an opponent, and their whole attention is absorbed by that game. So, as long as he is happy and still trying to learn more about the other person, both of them are just getting to know each other and exploring more. Until then, it's a game. When the whole exploration has happened, that's when you see the fights start, because then you begin to argue in the relationship due to the absence of an opponent or something unknown in the relationship. Instead, they should together pick up a new game and decide to play this game together, going through it, exploring and finding out more about it.

Life itself is a game. What I am trying to convey here is that if we do not consciously play a game, unconsciously, or subconsciously we choose a game which we may not be aware of. We end up picking many other games, often many other games, which we constantly fight in. We neither win nor lose; we are always in the world of unwanted games. Pick your games consciously and play them well without worrying about winning or losing.

For example, suppose two people are “not getting along well”, and you suggest, "Okay, get out of it." They respond, "No, no, I cannot get out of it." So, you say, "Then get in it." But they still refuse. So, they just keep on playing that game of “not getting along well” forever because that's what their actual game is. If they separate or get together their game of choice will be over.

Depending on the game people choose, they start a game that has an opponent. They learn all the tricks of the game and then beat their opponent, overcoming barriers to win it. Once the game is over, they pick up another one. You cannot just keep dragging the same game along because it loses its fun. To keep a game enjoyable, you keep adding more and more barriers, overcoming the barriers is the simplicity of a game.

Let's take another example: someone's mother is not well, and they want her to get better. This becomes everybody's game. "Oh, mother's health is deteriorating." It seems like this is the only game because it's capturing everyone's attention. They are constantly discussing it, calling the mother's sister, and sharing updates about her health. This game becomes the top priority. However, when you delve into this game and try to focus solely on helping your mother, you realize that many other games are going on. The older sister wants to ensure that it is her idea and not the brother's or the younger sister's idea. Thus, the brother and the older sister are playing their own game in this situation. And then the older sister and one more sister, they are friends with each other. So, these two are opponents against the other two siblings. There are two opposing groups playing a game. Now I find myself in the middle of this game. I have to listen to one party and then the other party, each claiming that they are doing a better job than the other. The mother is not the focal point of the real game; the real game is happening among all these four siblings. They want me to arbitrate and tell each other what to do. One sister suggests that I should inform the other sister about the mother, while the other sister advises me not to share the information about the mother with anyone else. In reality, they've brought me in as a referee or a coach, instructing me to help them play the game and not to fix the health of the mother, because the mother is not the real issue.

Their primary interest lies in determining who is right, who is wrong, who is winning, and who is losing in this whole process. They might lose their mother, but even after that, do you think the game will be over? No, they will just continue fighting and proving themselves right and others wrong .

You don't always have to involve another person to be in the game. People often play a game with the unknown. They might say, "Oh, there's a ghost following me, and I have a fear." So, that's their game. You might ask, "What are you afraid of?" They respond, "I don't know, but I'm always afraid." No matter how you try to help, they insist that it's not working. Their fear remains, and everything seems to fail. They visit different doctors and seek various forms of assistance, but they keep saying, "My fear is not going away." You should come to understand that this is their game. This is the game they're interested in playing. That is why no pathy or healing art can help get rid of the fear.

However, there should always be a game. You start your day, you go to the office, and then you come home. In the office, there are certain barriers to overcome, such as meeting deadlines and submitting reports on time. It's a game you play, perhaps not the most exciting one, but it's a part of everyday life with a little bit of variation. It still maintains your interest because there's a risk of failure, and that keeps you engaged. But what if you have a comfortable bank balance, and no pressing concerns? You might then wonder, "What is my game?" You have to think about what game to play. If you don't decide what game to play, you end up playing any other game not even of your choice, and those games are hard to give up because they are not your games of choice.

There's a saying that if you don't give someone a game, they will make you their game. For example, if your spouse or roommate isn't busy with their own life, they may start picking on you because they have free time. This becomes a game for them. They might nitpick about things like how you place your cup, insisting it should be arranged differently. Even if it doesn't really matter, they'll argue, "This is how I want it." So, you adjust, and then they complain, "Why do you have to follow me all the time?" They hold you to your word, saying, "Whatever I say, you do." This is how they engage in picking on you, and this becomes their game and you end up playing that game unknowingly.

You have to consciously choose your games so that you remain interested in them.

That's what I'm saying—you have to consciously choose your games so that you remain interested in them. Personally, I have selected numerous games for myself, such as business, self-improvement, and studying. I stay occupied with my games all the time. Everybody should choose their games, deciding, "This is the game I want to play," and then they need to introduce a known barrier into it.

When I start writing a book I have something in mind, an unknown—how will I develop it and then conclude it? It has become a game for me, and I love it. However, if it were to become monotonous, I would experience game-lessness, and I wouldn't perform well. My initial goal is to establish this definition of games with plenty of examples. Then, we'll move on to the next definition and conclude with some processes.

The definition of games is that there are always barriers, and you either overcome those barriers and win the game or you lose the game. Technically, it is said that whether you win or lose doesn't matter. The bottom line is that you should remain in the game. For instance, imagine a girl who is determined to help her younger sister get married because nobody is marrying her younger sister, and they have no parents. She's actively engaging with everyone, seeking suitable matches, visiting matrimonial sites, and doing everything possible to help her sister find a life partner. When the marriage finally happens, she's elated because it's a significant achievement. However, the day after her sister's wedding, she falls into depression because she didn't plan for any game beyond this point. She didn't consider what to do once her sister was married and gone. She cries and says, "I did so much, endured so much pain. You can't imagine what I went through." This is where I first realized that the bigger the win, the bigger the loss, and it leads to game-lessness.

Ideally, before her sister's marriage, she should have anticipated that her sister would eventually leave, so she could have created a new game for herself. People who retire from very active jobs often fall ill immediately after retirement because they don't think there's enough challenge in life anymore. The game they end up playing is one they didn't choose; it just happened to them. This is how games and game-lessness work.

Now, in the same pattern, when we talk about games, there are times when you experience losses in games. These losses can vary in scale, from a small loss like losing a debate, discussion, or argument to something bigger, where you expected an outcome, but it didn't happen the way you wanted. Sometimes it's a minor communication that didn't go as planned, and that too can be considered a loss. Then there are more significant losses, where you attempted something and it resulted in a loss. When you experience a loss, it can trigger feelings of nervousness or anxiety.

That nervousness starts accumulating in the body due to the fear of losing the game.

We will learn a process that can be incredibly helpful. You can do it at any time, and it will instantly make you feel better. This is called the process to fulfill the vacuum created by losses.

Create anything that seems precious to you.

So, whatever loss you're feeling right now, whether it's a loss for your dog, or you're feeling the loss of money or a job, create an object in your mind. Close your eyes, and create diamonds, gold, or whatever you consider valuable. Create a lot of them and then start bringing them into yourself. This is a process that works quickly, and we can do it right now to help you feel better.

Create anything that seems precious or valuable to you. You can create abundance of those things and let them come to you completely. Allow that flow to come to you. For material objects, create plenty of material items and then push them towards yourself. It can be pearls, gold balls, silver balls, dollars, rupees—anything you consider precious or valuable.

Based on my experience, I have observed that when different people create these objects, they tend to move towards the part of the body or direction where they're feeling the loss. It naturally gets directed towards that side. People often describe it differently, like if your stomach or abdominal area is feeling weaker due to a sensitive phase you're going through, the flow tends to move in that direction. If someone is stuck in their head, the flow goes towards their head. Similarly, if there's heaviness in the chest and you're feeling a loss or anxiety in that area, the flow tends to go there. This was my observation when I was helping people with this process.

So, I developed a concept from this observation.

If a particular part of you is feeling weak, why not create a flow and direct it towards that part? For example, if your mind or your legs are feeling weak, you can immediately cover that area with this flow. Instead of calling it imagination, I prefer to use the term "create." Create a constant stream of things coming to you, and they will naturally fill the vacuum wherever it exists in your energy pattern or in your body.

Surprisingly enough when these things are done, you will just create more whatever and it will not go in, it will go nowhere. It will just start bouncing out. And so, you will know that for now for today, you're done. It's not like you're done forever. And your mood and everything will change right away. This is a totally different dimension where we just dig deeper in the subconscious and we try to find out what is there. But in this process, you create energy from outside and that energy helps you let go of certain things, let go of anxiety, let go of pain, let go of uneasiness. So, that feeling of having them will come.

But the process in itself is to create more matter, matter which is solid because that is what fills up, that is what brings in energy, energetically. And then fills up the energy field around you.

CHAPTER 5

Physical World's Hidden Games

Understanding The Physical World's Undefined Hidden Games

Playing games involves having an opponent or a barrier and dealing with obstacles. Winning the game is the prime motto. When you win one game, you want to win more because you feel like a winner, not a loser. Another thing to think about is "hidden game conditions." This means watching how people act in different situations. In hidden game conditions, you want to see what's happening with other person by giving him a tough time.

Another example I can give of hidden game conditions is when you are working with your junior whom you don't like, and then in one way or the other, you irritate her, which she cannot even spot, but then she feels less and less and that makes you feel better and better. In family or personal relationships,hidden game conditions can happen, too. For instance, with a child, you might not give them what they want to see how they react and to see to which extent they will come up. This is called a hidden game condition: Will he go to you, beg for it, and be correcting himself? It's like a hidden game that is not defined to see if they will keep trying or figure things out.

These hidden game conditions are not always clear but can become a part of how we interact with others without realizing it. They happen automatically: you can't help it; you continue to play hidden games with other people.

In social situations, you might notice people doing things to get attention or create barriers. For example, you will see some people in hidden game conditions with you. They will cut your communication when you're talking. Or when everybody else is laughing at your joke, they will not laugh because they attract your attention and become your barrier.

Whether you decide to play these games actively or not, they happen naturally. Awareness of these dynamics can help you better understand social situations in a group or at work. Whether you want to be part of these hidden games or not, shaping how you interact with others is up to you. But, I want to put forward and stress again that either you pick your games or hidden games will automatically come to you.

In the physical world, you either pick your games, or hidden games will come automatically to you.

And these automatic hidden games keep coming to you as your irresolvable problems. You try to do everything, but those problems do not get solved. For example, somebody is trying to pass an exam, but he's unable to pass it. And whatever he might do about that, he thinks there may be a curse, or somebody has done something to them because they cannot pass this exam. That becomes a game that is not enjoyable and is painful. But then, that is a game. You might be worried about expanding your business, which is not expanding. That becomes a game that you wish to avoid playing.

If you choose a game you enjoy and play it well, you'll learn all its parts. Understanding the game helps you win. It's essential to keep picking games, no matter our age. Whether we're getting older or not, it doesn't matter.

I've seen that people with lots of games are healthier, better-looking, and busy.

What is Win-Stuck?

Another essential thing that I want to add over here is 'win stuck.' Win- Stuck is the definition of the condition where people sometimes get stuck after winning a game in their lives. They achieve something, and then they stay fixated on that win. They don't tolerate anything less and keep talking about that win, saying, "I did it this way, and this is the only way, I can do it." They struggle to move forward and stay stuck in the past. For example, imagine someone was a school principal or a top administrator. They received awards and recognition and became the best teachers. Even though those achievements are past, they still act the same way. They're so caught up in their past success that they can't accept anything less. They believe they've played big games; anything smaller is beneath them. Someone might say: "I used to close multimillion-dollar deals, and I even had an experience in China where people stood up and applauded, saying, "You are the guy." That time has passed, but I find adjusting to the present reality hard.

People often struggle to pick up a new game, so they become stuck in their past wins. It's crucial to be cautious about getting "win stuck." Whether you win or lose, the key is to keep moving forward and be open to new ideas.

When people lose, they often find themselves sitting and grieving, struggling to move forward. Interestingly, I've learned that being stuck doesn't just happen after a loss; it can also occur when someone is stuck in a win. They might feel they've accomplished everything and don't need to pursue anything else. They express a sense of being done, having played their innings well and having seen, done, and lived through it all. This is the expression of being stuck in a win.

Game of Victims: A Dynamic Analysis

I would also like to introduce the idea of victimhood, which can become a game sometimes. I recall a person sharing their life story with me, describing a childhood in poverty. Their parents were impoverished, and they often had only one meal a day, struggling to make ends meet. The father was an alcoholic, and the mother faced mental health challenges. The siblings would frequently fight. Listening to these stories can evoke sympathy, making you think, "Oh my god, what goodness is there in this story?" The person describes how this challenging life continues into their married life, with a husband who shares similarities with the alcoholic father. The situation remains tough despite working two jobs, waking up at 3:00 and returning home at 7:30 or 8:00.

Without understanding the dynamics I'm explaining, one might sympathize and offer help, suggesting finding a better job or a new home. However, these individuals may not prioritize their well-being, and their circumstances might not improve despite your efforts. It's a complex situation where helping does notleads to positive changes.

With this understanding, they actively participate in the victim game, but you feel it's important not to give up on them. However, breaking free from this game is a choice they must make. To make a change, they need to be educated to the point where they realize they are playing the victim. If they aren't willing to step out of this mindset, there's little anyone can do for them. It's a journey that requires their acknowledgment and commitment to move beyond the victim game.

There was a time when I wanted to start my practice, but I had all these reasons not to: my family wasn't supportive, I had a one-year-old son, and I was worried about what people would say. These thoughts were in my head until I read an article in the newspaper. It mentioned how sometimes we create excuses to justify our inability to do something. It appeared as if “The article” was written just for me. That woke me up from being a victim. I decided to take the first step, and as I moved forward, things started falling into place. It made me realize that falling into the victim position and playing that game is a real possibility.

Some people always maintain a beautifully sad expression, and you can't change it. It's like something has gone wrong in their life, and they've chosen to live with it. Have you ever noticed individuals like that?

Even now, I call it a game because these individuals have won. When someone expresses admiration, saying, "Oh my god, I admire you. How do you do it?"—that's a win. It's a payoff for their chosen path. Why would they want to change when they are being acknowledged and it's helping them navigate through life?

I recently encountered an individual who was facing some challenges in her life. In an attempt to offer assistance, I extended a job opportunity to her husband. However, tragically, within just two months of his employment, he fell into a coma and eventually passed away. To add to her already immense grief, she also lost her mother and her husband's brother in quick succession. It was a series of unfortunate events that left me pondering the extent of her suffering.

People continued to sympathize with her for the losses she's faced. When you engage with her, she brings tears in her eyes, recounting the same stories over and over. These experiences haven't faded away. In being a victim, she is winning. That's why I refer to it as a game—it's a strategy she plays, and it's successful. Perhaps others, like you or me, may never choose to play such a game. For instance, when I fall sick, I hesitate to tell people. I feel ashamed, thinking, "What will others say? What happened to you?" It's my game, a choice I make.

If you're trying to play the victim and it's not garnering enough attention or sympathy, you might think, "What do I do?" Someone suggests, "Just say no, not in the mood." So, you start saying no to people, even when you're hungry. As others keep asking, you repeatedly say no despite still being hungry. Eventually, when no one is around, you sneak into the kitchen and feed yourself. If the victim strategy isn't winning or working, you leave it.

Once a particular strategy or game starts winning, it becomes incredibly challenging to let go of it. It becomes your modus operandi and it does not matter even if it turns out to be painful to live with that strategy.

CHAPTER 6

A Metaphysical Perspective On Life's Games

Till now, we discussed the impact of the choices we make in our lives and the subsequent play. Let us now consider the giant game at play in this universe, revisiting the broader game unfolding within the universe.

Mastering the Art of Life: A Journey to Transcend the Seriousness of the Small Game

The more minor game represents the one you're actively engaged in – it's your game where things may seem broken. The idea is to shift your perspective: rather than solely focusing on your microcosm, your game, consider widening your view to the macrocosm. Remaining entirely absorbed in your game introduces the possibility of winning or losing, but when you become part of the bigger game, your attention transcends the small game.

In this context, the smaller games we play often take on a serious tone, leading to a shift where the initial essence of a game—meant for fun—becomes overshadowed by seriousness. So, one generally plays smaller games in a microcosm: one has picked their games; they played; they learn the mechanics of it.

But then this bigger game is the game, which is the whole and the complete part. I will discuss how this wholeness is achieved through harmonizing the different urges we experience as spiritual beings.

The main goal of our realizations or getting the knowledge or feeling is how you will experience that bigger game so that this minor game does not become serious.

The Ultimate Quest: Pondering the Final Game We Should All Play

This is another aspect of the game. Now, let's ponder what should be the final game, the ultimate one we all should be playing. Many of us share this common question, wondering if everything is a game. Even Krishna conveyed a similar message to Arjuna, suggesting that it's a predetermined game, and he should play his part because it's already a done deal. This notion is a barrier for all of us as we navigate through something unknown, living out our lives.

We live in the face of the unknown, unsure of what will happen once we leave this body. There's uncertainty, and against this backdrop, we are all engaged in the game of life. A story that has gained more significance for me over time is about a man who did something good for the king, and when asked what he wanted, he requested a piece of land. The king agreed and told him he could have the ground he covered by running until sunset. The man kept running, looking back until the sun hadn't set, pushing himself until exhaustion led to his death. What he needed was a small piece of land just covering his body. We are all running till the sun sets on us.

This story mirrors our lives as we run against the unknown, trying to gather as much as possible before our deadline, which is the end of our lives. The challenge lies in not knowing when that unknown will arrive. It is the unknown itself that creates the game.

I heard a joke about a man who worked as a chauffeur for his boss for 25 years. He drove him everywhere, worked hard, and took care of him. Unfortunately, the boss suddenly died in the car from a heart attack. Two years later, the chauffeur ended up marrying his boss's wife. He then humorously reflects, "I never knew that all those 25 years the boss was working for me; I thought I was working for him."

Similarly, when drafting my will or trust, a significant realization was a detailed 13–14-page document covering decisions when unconscious, body part donations, and money management. It made me question, "Who am I working for?" I'm putting effort into saving money in the bank, protecting it, and eventually leaving it for others. Even if someone is willing to take my organs, I won't be there to nurture them. This underscores the unknown nature of the game we're all playing against. Once you comprehend this game and remove the unknown element, would you still choose to play it?

That may be why you ask your friend not to spoil the ending when you watch a movie or read a novel. You express concern that knowing the end might diminish your interest, as the unfolding mystery is a significant part of the experience. You go through each page or scene, hoping for natural developments, and then, when it concludes, the impact is profound. Would you read that novel again now that you know the ending?

Precisely, the game of life we are playing is against the unknown. We are moving with the flow, navigating through uncertainties, and don't know what will happen. Discovering the end prematurely might make you realize, "Oh, okay, so this was what it was all about?" The mystery and unpredictability are essential elements of the journey.

I read another story many years ago about a monastery set aside for intellectuals. Only those who possessed knowledge of certain wonders were allowed to stay there. The tale spoke of a prophecy that the monastery would fall one day. When that day arrived, and the guards were absent, a farmer passing by noticed the unguarded gates. Excited at the opportunity to explore a place he'd never been allowed, he entered. Room after room, he marveled at the grandeur— big rooms, chandeliers, and grand walls. He reached the last room, the Sanctum Sanctorum, adorned with curtains. Feeling that today was the day he'd discover the secrets they had kept from him, he eagerly pulled the curtains aside. To his surprise, he found nothing behind them.

Life is like a mystery sandwich, and we are all immersed in this mystery. People are attempting to find answers, sharing their discoveries, each holding a piece of the puzzle. Everyone is trying to enter that room and unravel the truth behind the entire game plan and in the end finds nothing.

These stories, heard at various stages of life, carry different meanings each time. While you may have encountered them before, revisiting them at other times brings new insights and connections. It's fascinating how you can relate to the same stories differently as you navigate through the complexities of your journey.

It's interesting because we've essentially created a hero in our game, much like God, who is all-powerful and mighty—our Superman. We want to understand more about this figure because he can do anything and knows everything, protecting us. Whether knowingly or unknowingly, we seek him through various roles. We place him as a brother, father, husband, or friend, as all these roles reflect some part of him. So, we search for our Superman in various relationships outside ourselves.

As you progress, you start sensing that Superman is elusive, and your awareness evolves through different stages. The game's mystery unfolds as you try to uncover more about this figure. However, the more you pursue this concept, the more it slips away like an illusion. Much like the end of a story or the magic that happens after a movie, the answer still needs to be reached. It adds a beautiful layer to the game, making it distinct from the game we experience in the physical universe.

We sharpen our tools in the physical universe when we play our game. We make a game plan and make targets and try to achieve them. And then we win over them. You play for fun, whether it is a job, business, or game.

But in this game where you're trying to find the superhero — whether in the form of Jesus, Krishna, Allah, or whatever name you have given— the more you make targets and goals and seek them, the more you keep going away from you. So, it just doesn't come like that.

As we were discussing, I thought of an example from my own experience. I had the image of a farmer and an artist to clarify this concept. Consider a farmer—when he grows crops, he works with the soil and gets muddy or dirty. He's not solely focused on the profit he'll make from the harvest; instead, he falls in love with the crop and appreciates its growing. He continues working with the plant or the soil until he's tired, and that's how his day ends. The next morning, he returns to his crops and looks at his fields, and in this process, the farmer starts getting closer to being a Superman.

This farmer may not possess high-end skills; he works with his hands and the soil, nurturing the plant's growth. He engages in the mechanics of growing—watering, adding nutrients— while constantly thinking about the crop. He isn't growing crops for external reasons; he's doing it for the crop itself. He loves his plants and trees. Similarly, consider an artist. They learn the craft, perhaps from a guru, and they diligently practice—getting up to practice, sleeping, and practicing more. The focus is on personal growth, not to showcase on stage. With continuous practice, they strive for perfection. Both the farmer and the artist eventually reach a point of realizing that Superman. Both arrive at a moment of realization or the end of the game, connecting with Superman or the divinity within them.

In this game's mechanism, I've observed that when you start playing for the sheer joy of the game, aligning with the essence of the Gita, where you're not overly fixated on the outcome, it propels you to the next step in your journey, helps you align with yourself and helps you to find your Superman in you.

Being Completely One With Whatever You're Doing.

To achieve this, you don't need to abandon your work or retreat to seek divine 'OM' in isolation or head to a temple as if you want to distance yourself from the world for self-realization. Instead, this realization can emerge from the very work you're engaged in. My most significant realization occurred while pursuing and embracing my work, much like I'm doing now. I find complete enjoyment in it, with no hidden agenda. I love talking about it, explaining concepts, and discovering new words for expression. This engagement consistently brings me closer and closer to being a Superman.

I've come to understand that the rules of this game are different and more straightforward. There's no need for a complex learning process; observe a farmer and go with the flow in your purity. Don't assume that once I'm finished, I'll retreat, wash up, put on nice clothes, and then attempt to connect with him in that field. I've been through that stage, constantly feeling a scarcity of time, thinking, "Oh, my God, my time is wasted in these mundane activities. When will I be free from this and move towards the real thing, praying in isolation and spending time praising God ?" Whether you're scrubbing dishes or engaged in any seemingly ordinary task, do it with love for the activity—falling in love with the dishes and the dish soap. Take a moment to appreciate how beautifully you've done it, allowing a sense of pride or love to envelop you. Putting words to it is challenging, but the essence lies in being completely one with whatever you do. What you need is oneness and that is the bond between you and Superman.

This approach keeps you grounded in the present moment, offering the best way to be fully present.

As I reflect, I observe myself going through similar phases where I've felt frustration and dislike, asking others to leave me alone for a while. I've traversed those lanes, and now I understand that something becomes monotonous only when you perceive it as a repetitive daily task. However, if you are fully present at the moment, every day is a new day, every moment is a new moment. Yesterday is not today, and that shift in perspective breaks the monotony of living, propelling you from one moment to another in a new unit of time.

I've observed a person who is an artist and yearns for a break from her office to immerse herself in painting and express herself fully through her paintings. Curious, I asked her about the job she has been doing for about 16-17 years. She mentioned receiving lots of compliments for her work. I inquired if that artist's spirit is also present in her job. She affirmed, saying there is that artistic aspect.

I understood that being an artist goes beyond just the canvas; it should be infused into everything you do. Even peeling an apple can be done artistically. If you're an artist, peeling that apple won't result in a messy outcome. Instead, you'll create equal and beautiful pieces, presenting them in a way that enhances their appeal. Your artistic nature will manifest in every task, making everything you do take on a similar artistic perfection.

It's essential to recognize that this transformation is a journey; it won't happen overnight. Expect to experience emotional ups and downs along the way. Remember, the wisdom is in going with the flow—this is the key. Simply go with the flow, navigating through the challenges. Despite the pain, continue with your efforts, and over time, you'll notice how this pain evolves you into the next stage of appreciating yourself and appreciating the living. Anything you left hurting in the past is still present, and by addressing it, you contribute to your ongoing transformation.

Consider when you're sitting in a yoga posture, and your initially stiff legs make you think, "Oh my god, I can't sit through this," tempting you to get up in the middle. However, if you persist and continue, you'll notice a shift. Your legs adjust, and your body seemingly becomes weightless. After an hour, you might not even realize how long you've been in that posture. This is a tangible, physical example.

Similarly, when sitting in a chair and feeling stiff, it's common to think, "I can't endure this anymore." I've guided many through this process, encouraging them to persist despite initial resistance. After just a few minutes, they often find themselves not complaining anymore. Checking in, they share that it's been good—illustrating that there's another side to the discomfort once you navigate it.

The Silent Symphony of Subconscious Success

Winning happens for you, even if you don't consciously inform your mind. The recording in your mind will adapt and change, irrespective of your conscious efforts. This is the essence of going with the flow. People often talk about going with the flow and surrendering, but true surrender takes work. It gets tested, and there are moments when you feel you've had enough. You may think, "No more surrender; I can handle it." However, you might have yet to realize what surrender truly means. Once you go through it, you'll discover a bliss you would have missed if you had left the journey halfway. This game is different from others, where external assistance is common. This game is solely your journey; even with guidance, you must go through it yourself. The answer is to persist and continue; you will reach the end where things become effortless. It's not difficult at all; it's a matter of perseverance.

CHAPTER 7

In Search Of Higher Intelligence Through Artificial Intelligence

I grew up as a Hindu and followed all the rituals, fasting, going to the temple, and praying to God while looking at different pictures of gods. In my dreams, God would appear as Lord Krishna or Rama, whoever we believed in, there was no logic or rationalization. It was faith. Unquestionable faith. Later, I delved into rationalizing everything, which claimed that you are the God, the cause of your destiny, and you do everything. It occurred to me that maybe there is no god, and we have merely created a God we believe in. Consequently, I gave up the concept of God, thinking there's nothing like God; it is you. If you maintain a high cause level and keep yourself clean, you can create anything and everything.

This journey persisted for a long time, oscillating between believing in no God and the existence of a God that controls everybody, but the circle was not closing; something was missing.

You begin with words when you start your journey because every expression requires words. However, as you continue going through the journey, gradually, you begin to lose your grasp on words, becoming unable to express your emotions adequately through words because they fall short. After some time, a word like "happy" is just a word; you want to say, "I'm happy," attempting to represent some aspect of your emotion. Sometimes, that emotion intensifies, and you might say, "Oh, I'm so happy." Yet, even then, you can only convey it with words. This continues to escalate, and eventually, my happiness became so overwhelming that I couldn't contain it, and I started crying.

If another person would ask me, "Why are you crying?" and I would reply, "I'm not crying; this is my expression of happiness." I will also add that I can't express it any further. So, as I began losing my grip on words, emotions started taking over, and the concept was growing larger and larger. There was something else I was unwilling to explore, and I refrained from fully savoring it because every time I touched upon it, I withdrew. It used to be too much to handle or too overwhelming to grasp. Therefore, I began searching again and conducted research during my doctorate, focusing on God.

Discussing this topic is essential when we're trying to cleanse ourselves, and follow the principles of living. What is our destination in life? What is the goal of all this? We began with spiritual realization, wanting to understand ourselves and there should be a destination for all the navigation we're doing. While the journey is enjoyable, there should be an endpoint to it. That's why I wanted to express it so that you can understand what God is, what it means to be like God, and how the concept got tangled. You may agree or disagree, but I always strive to explain things in a fundamental form.

Connecting With God's Essence: Nature

When this realization about God started dawning upon me in my journey, I noticed that most came from nature. For instance, when I approached the ocean, I felt a compelling attraction and a sense of oneness with it. I felt like I could drown in it because the interest was intense. My tone matched the ocean's vibrancy and life. I found much more meaning in the sea than others might have. I also began to observe plants, mainly the weeds that would grow overnight in my backyard, seemingly without any seeds. I wondered about the mechanism behind their growth, especially since they were considered unwanted. It may seem strange, but abstract concepts often need more followers. I would also contemplate the wind. When it blew, I could feel its energy and resonated with the same vibration. It felt like an experience beyond ordinary perception as I merged with that vibration. It could almost uproot you from where you are, but you need to be cautious not to get carried away and lose touch with reality. I'll pause here to help you understand how I tried to break down these experiences into various components.

As long as the definition of 'Who I am' remains strong, you miss the abundance outside And so, I realized, like me, myself being Alka, I have defined myself. I create this image of who I am, my likes, dislikes, qualifications, and my house. I have a perfectly defined picture of myself and continually reside within that self-defined framework. This is who I am, and I emphasize it strongly, reinforcing my strong preferences and taking pride in being myself. In other words, you could call it ego or self-definition, as some might say. So, as long as this definition remains strong, you do not reach out, and you miss the abundance outside because you have limited yourself within.

When I meet with you, I see this is me, this is you, this is Shruti, this is Rupali. We meet, talk to each other, maintain our distance, and say, "This is my space; that's your space." We agree, we disagree; many formulas and mechanisms are at play. But if I'm not me and dissolve my definition, I merge with nature and enjoy that. I thought about all these things, and I am trying again. Such a zone remains, and you cannot curtail it. So, I started looking at it more and more and letting myself go, or in other words, I surrendered. That concept is also found in many kinds of literature. When you start submitting, you begin to let go of your definitions.

Even something small like "I don't like ginger," which is a strong definition, can be released. People know, and they make food for you without ginger, saying, "Oh, I didn't put ginger because you don't like it, right?" You say, "Yes, I have never eaten it." So, that's letting go of the "me being me." As a result, after that, you start merging with nature, and the concept of oneness, which has been discussed, like being one with the Almighty or being one with the Supreme, starts opening up. Then, you connect universally with the outside, and it feels great to be one with the wind and one with the ocean. That is part of the ongoing journey. So, I will backtrack again. Then, I also started my journey as a Hindu, following whatever was in our epics or what we were being taught. Everybody showed me whatever they knew. The subject of Scientology showed me what they knew, and being Hindu showed me what they knew, like temples and people. Then I got married into a Muslim family, and they showed me that side of God or religion. So, everybody showed something or the other in which they wanted to believe. Whatever you believe in, whether it is yourself or something else, is the end, because you stop there. You believe in being Hindu, then you stop there, and you're done.

That is the end, something that is not the beginning. So, anything that says, "Okay, this is what it is," is not how nature is. Have you seen wildlife? You do not know any boundary to it. The ocean and sky are endless, and it's all around us. There is no limiting definition of these things. The wind has no description. It just blows in abundance and goes in all directions.

Recently, we went to Seattle, and on our way back, I suggested to my family that we visit Mount Shasta before heading home. They were not initially ready for it, but somehow, I convinced them and offered to drive. I was excited; the sunset and we were on a curvy road. I felt so happy and connected. Someone asked me if someone lived in Mount Shasta, and I replied, "No, we're going because of Mount Shasta." It felt like I would meet a relative there, and I couldn't stop thinking about it. That night, I went to bed, thinking I would see Mount Shasta in the morning. The idea of Mount Shasta consumed my thoughts.

One of my friends woke up early the following day and went outside. When he returned, I asked him if he had seen Mount Shasta. He said, "No, I didn't see it." I was surprised because I thought Mount Shasta would be big enough to be seen easily. He was so lost in his thoughts that he couldn't see it. When I saw the magnificent mountain covered in snow. It was beyond words that it moved me to tears. I felt a gravitational pull towards it as if my body would remain there and I would merge into the mountain. These are the natural bonds you form when you become one with nature.

From Human Intelligence to Higher Intelligence

You are being natural; you are being like nature. So, you are being one with nature. If you continue to walk this journey where you are clearing yourself, following things, and processing your emotional energies, the next step; it comes by itself. When it starts coming, nobody can stop it because it comes even if you try to prevent it. I said that you are a human, in a human body, and you are being a human being. A human being can think, forecast, and analyze; that's why it's called a human being. Humans have learned many things and created filters from what they've learned. They look through the eyes of the schools they attended, the filters of their upbringing, the teachings of their parents, their education, and their jobs and friends. They have so many filters around them. This is the human intelligence that we've developed. Then, there are these things I call artificial intelligence, now known as AI, and it's becoming more prominent in handling tasks and thoughts for you.

Initially, I thought we were only relying on artificial intelligence. Still, I realized we believe in all these other things, and these filters are just separating us from higher intelligence.

So, for God or the concept of God, I came up with the term "higher intelligence," cSo, if you see, people go to the pyramids, study them, and then write about their studies in books. Other people read those books and became civil engineers, constructing masterpieces like the pyramids. So, the pyramids that have been created, nature has already been made by higher intelligence in perfect balance. A network is already in place, wireless connectivity is already there, and storage is readily available. With our understanding, we human beings observe these facts, and by following them, we replicate higher intelligence.

We created the internet, which serves as a substitute for consciousness. Using cloud storage, we simulated the universe's existing memories. The things we have learned and are learning are not invented by anyone. A researcher searches for items that already exist through research. People formulate things and present them to you; things already exist. No new inventions have been made. Everything existed somewhere sometime earlier.

Artificial Intelligence: A Bridge or Barrier to Higher Intelligence

I figured out that higher intelligence exists, and our distance from it increases as we insert artificial intelligence in between. Artificial intelligence encompasses how we are brought up, our emotions, education, learning, purposeful consciousness, arguments, and discussions. All of this constitutes artificial intelligence, which distances us from higher intelligence.

Then it became my journey, following this understanding and trying to experience the nature around me, believing that God is around and exists, and feeling that energy vibration and all those things. After a few days or months, I realized that I didn't connect to anything whenever I tried to connect. I felt desperate, wondering why my connection was slipping. Previously, I could experience all these things, but now I was unable to because I was trying to experience them externally.

We are a part of the Higher Intelligence

I realized that if God is internalized, we merge with higher intelligence. The subsequent realization was that I am part of a higher intelligence. That is the journey where you become and experience oneness and start feeling natural, just like nature.

After that, it expanded a little more. I could see myself being one with higher intelligence, and I would see the same higher intelligence in other people as well. This started aligning with the old concepts in our VEDAS, Gita, or wherever, and everything began to make sense.

I first realized the story we were told about a deer running, chasing the smell coming from his navel region, thinking it was coming from somewhere else. For the first time, that story seemed real to me. The beauty of the story's simplicity lies in that no matter where you start your journey, you return to the same point. You go all around, putting in effort and doing this and that, and then you realize it's like seeing sea waves from afar, looking powerful, but they reach the shore, and that's it. It came full circle for me.

Once you find that whole circle of oneness, your desires change.

Once you find that whole circle of oneness, everything becomes multi-dimensional for you, and your desires may change. Desire to conquer the world or accumulate wealth may transform because you feel a sense of ownership over everything. You don't feel a deficiency in material possessions. You may still pursue goals or play the game, but that sense of insecurity is no longer there.

On a higher level, consider if someone in front of you opens a massive goldmine and says it's all yours. What will you do? You will say, "Okay, it's all mine now. I can sit and relax; I don't have to do anything." You might still do something, but you have the certainty that the gold mine is yours, and you can use it whenever you want.

Backtracking the story again, the realization of God is a simple path, not complicated. Artificial intelligence, books, and lectures by others make it difficult. When you try to reach a point that others have experienced, and they impose it on you, it becomes complicated. However, there are moments when you experience that oneness. When you watch a sunrise or sunset, have you ever been entirely speechless and connected to the universe for a second? Then, it just fades away.

My answer is that we all seek that, but there is somewhat dishonesty. We are actually not seeking it. When you desire something you seek, you always think about it. But here we get easily distracted.

I was thinking, what if someone comes over and says, "I'm God"? Nobody will easily believe him. We don't know what he has to do to prove that he's God because of the artificial intelligence in between. Everybody thinks that God has to fit a specific mold. Maybe they will ask him to perform miracles, and even if he does, they might say, "No, this is not good enough. Can you do something even bigger? Can you turn the Earth upside down?" I don't know what they would ask that God figure to perform to prove himself about his Godliness. Even if I promise a 100% guarantee, saying, "Come over, God is coming this evening at 6:30 at the meridian," nobody will come. They will say, "No, no, no. God doesn't come like that." We are in no mood to believe that God exists but paradoxically we say that God exists!

Once you find that whole circle of oneness, your desires change.

Once you find that whole circle of oneness, everything becomes multi-dimensional for you, and your desires may change. Desire to conquer the world or accumulate wealth may transform because you feel a sense of ownership over everything, learning ABC from the beginning, counting one and two, and asking, "Where is your nose?" Every lifetime, we end up doing the same thing over and over. This is the concept of God. Keeping that in mind, I will draw one more picture.

So, human beings here mostly have a form, and all these forms are distinct. We have different appearances; countless forms have been created. Eventually, this form reaches its end, becoming formless. Then, with human eyes, you can no longer see that person or being and say, "Oh, they're no more." But they merge with the formless. This cycle happens; it's inevitable whether you want to believe in it or not. Whatever you might do, this is the final truth.

A few people say that if you want to start your life journey, you should start from that aspect because the time lapse between going from form to form-less is not determined; it's not final. You never know when it will happen. It would help if you understand this aspect because you transition between both of them. If you consider which universe you belong to more, the form-less or the form universe? You are essentially a part of the form-less universe and occasionally come in form and enjoy the physical universe.

We do it unconsciously because we are not making a choice. We don't say, "Enough for now, I'm going home, I'll relax for some time, and I'll come back again." We're just playing, and when you finally realize that you are doing this, that is what Moksha is, in simple words – understanding this cycle of dying and then not dying, which means leaving the form and taking up the form. Gita also said that you do not die; you change from one form to another. When you understand this, you gain ultimate freedom.

What is the ultimate fear at present?

The ultimate fear is fear of death! The forms are so dear to us that it is unimaginable to continue to live without it. We have no certainty that we can create more forms or come back again. We have no confidence. You won't be that scared when you are sure about this thing. You'll say, "Okay, I will take another form, create the house again, buy all the household items again, another piece of land – everything can be done repeatedly," that confidence needs to be restored.

To prove the concept of us circling back to this world, you can observe the younger generation coming now. They are all returning. How can you tell? They are born with ailments like diabetes and asthma. Old age diseases are being carried forward from early on. And this kid, just in the sixth grade, is shooting and killing. He's continuing from the same old cycle. You can tell that these younger people are not our juniors; they are our seniors because they already know way more than us. The things that still interest us do not interest them; they are already bored. Today's youth is bored with many things as if they have been there, done it and seen it all many times while we're still exploring.

Eventually, the planet, this Earth, gets boring for those who keep returning. Eventually, it becomes boring. Is there anything you haven't done? Take a look at our children. When all is said and done, what will be left? The only thing left might be to earn another degree. Is there anything to look forward to? There is nothing. The same cycle keeps repeating over and over again, and this happens. In the event you do it knowingly, Getting up in the morning, cooking food, eating half an hour later, eating again, then sleeping might be pretty dull - even during lockdown, so you might want to avoid returning. If I asked you, "Would you like to join me?" You might say, "No, that's boring. I don't want to go there.", waking up, watching TV, sleeping again, getting up, and repeating the same routine. That's how it becomes boring when we do it unknowingly. When we overcome that mystery, the game is over. Then, you want to start or not start and become part of the ultimate beauty, richness, or growth – everything in abundance. Our journey involves pretending not knowing and then working hard to know and then not knowing.....

It is a journey backward; the farther you go, the further you run from where you started. If the time is right, start taking the journey backwards so that you can keep track of where you are coming from. Afterwards, you can go wherever you want, but always remember your way back. Like all car navigation systems, when the driver says, "Take me home," the car begins to move towards his home. As a result, you don't have to worry about getting lost since the navigation system knows where the home is!

I once had someone ask me what my role is as a mother. What is my responsibility as a parent to provide good food, TV, and cars? There was an indication that these things had been enjoyed repeatedly. In your role as a mother, it's your job to make sure your child realizes where they come from and where they are headed so that they can understand where they are heading as well. It's just a temporary visit to Earth, so they're only here for a short while. It will be more enjoyable for them if it is as they would want it rather than when we the parents try to make everything perfect for them. When they grow up, you may wonder why you couldn't make them happy despite providing everything they could possibly want. Possibly we overloaded them with gadgets, things, and books, but maybe that wasn't what they wanted. The way out was the one they needed, and we showed them the way in. Entrapped them more and more in the illusion.

Breaking out of this worldly cycle requires courage. I dropped out of the mad race when I was 25 or 26; everyone else was trying to make money and conform to social norms at that time. In the middle of the race, I quietly stepped aside without anyone noticing. My goal has been to find answers to the questions that many of us wonder about, but that we pretend to be busy and ignore. Due to the possibility that others may think I was going crazy, I kept it a secret. During my childhood, my father would have been furious, saying, "Is this what you have been brought up to?" You have betrayed us. I completely disappointed my family with my choices regarding my life journey. They practically disowned me for standing up for what I believed in. My belief in the pursuit of higher intelligence rather than artificial intelligence. It is important to constantly seek while living in the same world and playing the expected roles in order to avoid disrupting the system. Until your circle of liberation is complete, seek and draw it constantly. Once it's completed, it's a full circle. An endless circle with no beginning or end. Artificial intelligence meets higher intelligence continuously and forever.

Part 2

CHAPTER 8

Harmonizing Urges: A Path to Transformation

Harmony of Urges: Crafting a Symphony for Overall Well-Being

It is natural for you to have certain basic urges when you assume a physical form, define yourself, and take on attributes such as a name. It is instinctual to want to protect oneself, preserve oneself, and maintain one's self-care. Following that, there is a desire to acquire knowledge, and this pursuit becomes more refined over time - for example, by attending school and college. In the beginning, humans learned everything from nature, learning by failing and experimenting. Gradually the organized knowledge took over and was passed on from one to another. The urge to learn and know more and more is the philosophy of livingness.

The livingness invites one to expand oneself by associating with others. This drive brings a man and a woman together, whether to have children or engage in any creative endeavor. It's another impulse to manifest oneself; you cannot limit your existence solely to yourself; the desire is to share life with somebody else so that two people can together create more life through offspring or children.

People feel a sense of belonging at home, engaging in activities like cooking. There is an inherent urge to create and manifest oneself through various actions. Beyond human connections, there is also an intrinsic urge to connect with nature through plants or animals. Some individuals immerse themselves so deeply in this connection that they establish nurseries, passionately caring for and narrating stories about each plant. Observing such dedication is awe-inspiring. For instance, Maritza's love for her dogs showcases how one can live through animals. Initially, I wasn't a pet lover, I would overhear conversations about people passionately discussing their cats and dogs. I found myself intrigued by their enthusiasm and realized that, in their way, they were living through these pets.

Another facet of this urge arises when two people come together, forming a connection that extends to meeting more individuals and eventually desiring to live in a group. This group dynamic is fulfilling, whether participating in church, attending school, or working in an office. Survival, in this sense, is intertwined with group association. This urge involves being part of a larger human group. In today's interconnected world, we find ourselves concerned about events in other parts of the globe, exemplified by our collective awareness of happenings in Italy, India, or China. This connectivity reflects a shared humanity. The recent global pandemic is a poignant example of how events in one corner of the world impact us all. We seek positive updates, even from places that might be considered adversaries at times, as there is an innate urge to coexist and thrive in a shared existence.

As women residing in America, we cherish the freedom we have. However, hearing about countries or nations where women are suppressed evokes a sense of empathy and concern. This feeling is rooted in our innate urge to thrive personally and see others experience the same freedoms. We want to share the joys of liberty with women around the world.

It is also a natural urge—to express and manifest yourself. You create your home, possessions, and even your clothing; each becomes a unique extension of your identity. It goes to the extent where you have your pillow, and sleeping on another feels unfamiliar because you have your best sleep on your pillow. The connection extends to items like your PC or your car, each serving as an extension of yourself. When you say someone else drives your vehicle or works on your computer, it feels like someone else touches a part of you. Expressing yourself through the things you own becomes a distinctive way of identifying with and manifesting your individuality. The universe unfolds after that, a mystery beyond our own. I noticed a trend of assembling gadgets and a number of items during the 20th and 21st centuries. In In 1995, I shared an apartment with a young man from Germany. In order to stay within my budget, I meticulously calculated all expenses and converted them into rupees. In contrast, my roommate, a wealthy man's son at the age of 20, had an overflowing refrigerator. My first exposure to developed countries and the extent of their material possessions occurred at this time. Interesting enough, I rarely saw him at home. I asked him about his absence at night, and he casually responded, "I was so bored." This concept puzzled me. Boredom was an expensive luxury in the country I grew up in; every moment demanded effort and attention. Electricity went off unpredictably, and water was only available sometimes. Boredom wasn't a luxury in a setting where life's essentials were uncertain. A developed country made me realize this. The place I stayed had a garage full of various items.

Though now my garage is also bursting with belongings, it was a new experience. The cycles hung on the wall and things were scattered around, a reflection of what we did in the 20th century, when we accumulated, assembled, and bought everything we could.

Modern youth engage in discussions about spiritualism and delve into books to gain more knowledge. There are some who struggle with depression and anxiety, which motivates them to seek a deeper understanding of the universe. Aspiring to comprehend the deeper aspects of existence is the esoteric urge. Spirituality and the Universal Spirit are often associated with this urge. In addition, there is another urge: the urge to reach or understand God. Today, everyone crafts their own deity based on their beliefs and ideals, sculpting a god tailored to their convenience. Individuals adopt a concept of God that provides them with comfort, asserting their deity as superior to all others.

It is interesting to note that this impulse, initially rooted in the instinct to care for oneself, has evolved into the desire to understand the concept of God. Despite this, the nature of God remains elusive, so people have been forced to create their own interpretations, shapes, and forms. After contemplating this, I came to understand the symphony or harmony we often talk about in more depth.

Think of figures like Jesus, the prophets, Rama, or Krishna. All of them orchestrated harmony to create a symphony. In their teachings, everyone must maintain a sense of balance by praying together and sharing concepts. For instance, Jesus referred to himself as a messenger, akin to the relationship between Father and Son. Prophet Muhammad claimed to hear voices—a phenomenon that, in contemporary times, might be labeled as schizophrenia. Nevertheless, he relayed the messages he heard, and these communications became the Quran, forming the basis for a community of followers.

The next stage is the aesthetic urge, which is to live in a world of beauty. A desire to witness beautiful things, to stand there in silence, to simply experience beauty, is inherent to us. Unlike the concept of God, which may be elusive and difficult to grasp, the aesthetic band provides a direct and tangible experience of God. The aesthetic band includes moments such as standing beside an ocean, witnessing a sunrise or sunset. My symphony is about experiencing something that opens up for you. The final urge is to adhere to ethics or to be ethical. Integrity and wholeness are the values I will use in defining ethics.

Being at the pinnacle of existence

You're chipping away your happiness and fulfillment by doing things that don't make you happy. You feel unwell, as if something is wrong inside you. What if you accidentally hit a damaged car? You're asked to pay for the damage, but when you look at the car, it's already pretty damaged. When things are already bad, making them worse doesn't matter as much.

When striving to make things perfect, something breaks or chips away a little; you feel a sense of loss. The highest state of existence isn't about being godlike but integral or whole.

And then you tune in to what's happening in the universe. You become one with the whole; that's the entire narrative. It's the complete story of us, starting from being ourselves and then completing the circle. However, for our well-being, if we've covered all these urges, having one urge incomplete or out of control can disrupt the completeness or leave the circle incomplete.

Embracing Growth: The Commendable Journey of Continuous Learning Continuous learning is commendable: Learn from here, there, everywhere, and embrace the changes. Continue along that path of growth and evolution."

I assure you that progress toward that universal sound will encounter numerous barriers. Physical problems may arise, your source of income may falter, relationships may break, and loved ones may pass away. It's like playing a game of Ludo, where even at 99, a snake bite can bring you down. But this is the challenge. As you navigate through these trials, they become less hurtful

Discovering and Fulfilling Human Urges

A woman XYZ serves as an example, satisfying the desire to survive as herself through pursuits like learning music and engaging in painting. This is a personal fulfillment, and her happiness stems from these individual expressions. The second urge involves caring for her husband and contributing to creating their shared world. The presence of children adds another layer to her face as she lives and expresses herself through them. Being part of a family or group further extends her sense of self; the well-being of relatives brings her stability and joy. Moreover, the connection with plants and animals, embodied by her dogs, is yet another dimension of expression. The physical universe, encompassing possessions like cars and clothes, contributes to her identity. Even seeking knowledge and God's realization represents a spiritual dimension in her life. The critical insight is that if any of these dynamic urges remain unfulfilled, one experiences a corresponding sense of incompleteness. The fulfillment of all these urges collectively shapes the person's overall well-being, and even if some are satisfied, the incomplete ones may dampen the overall pleasure derived from the others. It's crucial to maintain a balance among all these urges, as I've observed. So, when you focus excessively on one urge and neglect all the others, that one desire may also fade away; this is an observation, not something someone prescribes. I've noticed individuals passionately dedicating themselves to a single urge, such as certain artists. Have you ever seen some artists who, despite being poor, excel in their artistic pursuits? Consider a comedian who went through depression despite making everyone else laugh. He was primarily working on the aesthetic urge. A sitar player, Ravi Shankar, still did not teach his own child, Anoushka. He didn't have any disciples and faced insecurities. Despite marrying twice, he ended up living alone in New York. However, he achieved a height of perfection in his chosen field. The definition of happiness also keeps changing over time. What makes you happy at 19 is different from what makes you happy at 50 and what makes you happy at 70. The definition of happiness should evolve, but I've observed that keeping a balance in the human urges, keeps one evolutionary on the path to happiness.

CHAPTER 9

Managing Anxiety And Insecurity For Transformation

When unpredictable things start occurring, you begin losing confidence or stability in your future predictions.

As we grow in life, it unfolds unexpectedly. The next day, anything can happen, and in a week, things can change. Consider the situation, where suddenly everything changed. It's like an exciting movie with lots of suspense when such events occur. You are still dreading where the story will go or what will change suddenly. Life follows a similar pattern. When I gave birth to my son, I started seeing the world from his eyes. From his perspective, we all appeared so big, and he seemed so small. The entire house was designed for our convenience, not his. We expected him to fit into roles we had decided, living in a world of "No, no, no, don't touch this and don't touch that." Understanding the world from his eyes, I started making his world more predictable for him.

My first decision was not to confine him to a world of "no." To achieve this, spending time with the child is crucial for building a rapport. In developing this connection, spending time and engaging with him is critical. When I cooked in the kitchen, I'd have him sit next to me to observe. His interest shifted to kitchen gadgets rather than toys, though traditionally, we weren't supposed to give them to him. Still, I would allow him to touch the devices, letting him mimic my actions. Even if it led to some disruption, I embraced it. when he picked up my lipstick to play with, I'd allow it. When I folded clothes and prepared to put them in the closet, he would come in and start unfolding them. I'd sit beside him, acknowledging his contribution. Although he didn't differentiate between folding and unfolding, he was contributing. This way, I created a predictable world for him—communicating that specific actions were acceptable. This approach differs from the unpredictability of the world we all grew up in.

There are instances when suddenly you witness your mother crying, parents fighting, loud noises at home and confusion sets in. The child doesn't comprehend what's happening, and confidence in his world starts to shake. Suddenly, people are fighting and arguing loudly, and the child cannot make sense of it. When unpredictable things start occurring, you begin losing confidence or stability in your future predictions.

Regarding the definition of insecurity, many people express feeling insecure or anxious. When things happen all of a sudden, uncertainty prevails. You're always on edge unsure if something unexpected will occur. These minor incidents start accumulating from childhood and are considered part of living and everyday life. People often label this as normalcy, assuming the same happens to everyone. We accept it as a typical environment, thinking it's no big deal. However, growing up in such everyday environments, I've observed that many of us lack comprehension of life. Such an unpredictable life made me indecisive and found it challenging to decide on anything. I was so unsure and that was a sign of anxiety. This reflected having less confidence and struggling to decide on various matters—choosing subjects, selecting a life partner, or deciding whom to love—in everything, self-doubt, insecurity, and anxiety started creeping in, leading to uncertainty about what lay ahead for me.

Confidence rises when you transition into the world of knowledge or knowingness.

looking at all that I've been taught till now, living in a world of constant "No, no, no," where things are forbidden, and you're not supposed to know about them, insecurity, anxiety, and confidence loss start. Confidence rises when you transition into the world of knowledge or knowingness. This holds from childhood until individuals are dependent on you, especially when you're feeding them. It's a sensitive situation for children viewed from an individual perspective. They reside in your home, and you're providing for them. That underlying insecurity shapes their reactions. You will feel the same way if you live in somebody's house; unsure of acceptance, you might question yourself, 'Am I accepted? Am I doing everything right?" worrying about being asked to leave at any moment.

When you contribute to the household, you feel a sense of ownership.

So, starting from a young age, it is crucial to make them aware of their rights and duties in the house. When you contribute to the household, you feel a sense of ownership, as if it is your own house. Another observation I made while working with children of different grade levels in school was that, despite parents providing everything, children were insecure and needed more confidence.Parents go the extra mile, reassuring them, "Don't worry, we are here for you; just focus on studying and getting good marks." However, I noticed that, increasingly, children are less sure about themselves. The sense of ownership and belonging to the house is missing. In contrast, when parents do everything for their kids, taking on all responsibilities, including homework and science projects, children become less and less sure about themselves.

The effort is to make children independent, saying they must do everything by themselves, it also makes them unsure because they lack sufficient information about life.Children need guidance and direction and an informative path helps them get to the desired goals. Leaving them completely on their own also increases insecurity and unknown-ness. Both these extremes in childhood make us very unsure and less confident.

Unpacking Adult Anxiety: Tracing the Roots Back to Childhood

So, if someone comes today, let's say they're 30, 35, or 50 years old, expressing, "I'm very anxious; I remain very anxious. And I do not have much self-confidence, self-esteem, this and that," I instinctively examine their childhood before delving into the current situation. Many of them, in their youth, resorted to different strategies to prove their confidence to themselves or others. Some became introverted, immersing themselves in a fantasy world where they controlled everything, including all the characters. In this fantasy realm, they had complete confidence in navigating those characters. Others rebelled against the whole system as a means to showcase their confidence. But upon closer examination, the underlying factor is being unsure—uncertain about what is expected of them and what is acceptable from them.

For this, there were some solutions I looked into and figured out. When encountering subjects like this, you might think, "Oh, my God, my mother did not do the right thing. She handled me like this. That's why I'm like this." Then you look at your mother and realize she also didn't know. And then you see your mother's mother also didn't know. So, in a chain, it passed from one generation to another—everyone was ignorant, and that ignorance was perpetuating. It eventually landed on me. Now, I need some help to sort myself out. But then you see where it is coming from.

The Origins of Insecurity, Anxiety, and Low Confidence

I noted that in any relationship, when two people want to go into a partnership—whether a husband and wife or two partners—they ensure that both parties understand what they should do to avoid misunderstandings. However, in marriage relationships, particularly from the parents' perspective, there is often uncertainty about roles and responsibilities. What is the definition of a father? What is the definition of a mother?

When a child enters the picture, you first introduce them to everybody, giving them a name during the naming ceremony. Then, you acquaint them with the surroundings and explain how things work. This process helps the child orient themselves in the environment as they grow. The root of insecurity, anxiety, or a lack of confidence often stems from this unknown world where individuals are unsure and unfamiliar.

So, I've observed people growing up, and in their conversations or observations, they frequently add the phrase, "I don't know." It's commonly used when people express something and then follow it with a disclaimer, stating, "But I don't know." The key lies in exploring this realm of uncertainty, seeking answers to the unknown, and discovering the missing pieces. This process contributes to increasing confidence and reducing insecurity.

For example, during layoffs, the uncertainty of whether one will be affected can create a sense of insecurity. Sitting there, pondering, one may be hesitant to learn more about their situation, fearing the potential outcome.

Unveiling Answers Within to Navigate Life's Confusions

This fine curtain between fear and confidence often hinges on what one doesn't know and may be afraid to find out. Whether lacking answers or fearing the unknown, these factors shape one's confidence level. So, there are various ways to find out answers to increase confidence. One is that you can go to the source and find the answers. You can go and open a book and find out the answer, or you can go to Google and find a solution. So, that is an education that enhances you, and then you get more responses and feel confident about it.

Another approach is to seek answers from within, from yourself. The confusion often resides within, so you pose a question to yourself and patiently wait for the reply. Most of the time, the answer does come, although it may take some time. This internal inquiry helps uncover where the need for more information is coming from. Often, during the process, an "aha" moment occurs, and you realize the source of the confusion.

So, acquiring knowledge from external sources is essential, but obtaining knowledge from within is equally important. This requires introspection and various processes like mindfulness and meditation. In these practices, the goal is to seek answers from within. An extreme example is Vipassana meditation, where individuals isolate themselves for ten days, refrain from communicating with others, and focus on finding solutions from within.

The Pitfalls of Turning to the Wrong Source

In the same process, there's one fascinating aspect I'd like to mention, which was a new piece of information for me. Sometimes, we must turn to the right source for answers or solutions. Surprisingly, this wrong source can provide an answer, and we might hold onto that answer indefinitely. We may resist replacing it, even when confronted with the realization that the answer is incorrect. Let's examine some instances of wrong answers we've embraced and retained.

For instance, someone suggests that you should always drink water with food, while another advises drinking water before eating. Yet, another recommends consuming water after half an hour once you finish your meal. These are three different answers to the same question. The one that relieves acid burn or stomach ache becomes the suitable answer. You start believing that this is the correct approach. If this wrong answer were to be questioned or discarded, it might disrupt everything. Similarly, in our lives, we often operate with numerous wrong answers acquired from various sources, and we continue living our lives without critically examining them.

False Datum: The Foundation of Misguided Beliefs

To describe this phenomenon, I coined the term "false datum" — a piece of information that one possesses and continues to uphold, thinking that if abandoned, it would shake the foundation of one's life philosophy. Yet, upon closer examination, he realizes that letting go of such false data brings peace, and it becomes evident that it's not always true. Something that is not consistently true cannot be considered valid data. You have to sit with yourself and seek answers from within, questioning your life principles. Determine whether they work consistently or not. Keep them if they work—making you more confident, surer, and happier. If not, let them go. With abundant data from all sides, the cumulative effect can make you more or less confident. It's crucial to learn to distinguish between false data and true data. This requires actively seeking more information to discern what is true and false. Keeping unverified information can lead to increasing uncertainty about the current situation.

Stable datums provide a sense of continuity and security, BUT evaluate whether they are true or false.

On the other hand, there is a concept called a stable datum. In your upbringing, your parents often serve as stable datums. If, for example, your mother is usually at home when you return every day, her presence becomes a stable datum. When this stable datum is disrupted—like when your mother is not home—it creates confusion, and you start searching for her everywhere to restore the expected order. Finding her and confirming her whereabouts helps restore a sense of certainty.

I recall an incident from my early childhood when I was around four years old. My family went shopping, and I must have fallen asleep at one of the shops. They decided to let me sleep while they shopped and planned to come back for me. When I woke up, I was surrounded by unfamiliar faces, and everyone was trying to comfort me, saying, "Don't worry." Although my parents or caregivers eventually returned (I don't remember all the details), this experience left a lasting impact on me.

As I grew older, I reflected on this incident and realized that the fear of being left out, the fear of abandonment, had always been a part of me. This early memory of being left alone and the ensuing shock stayed with me. It highlighted how the sense of unknowingness and unpredictability can arise when stable datums—like parents, home, or job—suddenly disappear from one's life. To navigate life, it's crucial to have stable datums that provide a sense of continuity and security. However, it's equally important to evaluate whether the stable datum guiding your life is true or false.

The distinction between opinion and fact.

This realization leads to the third aspect: the distinction between opinion and fact. Often, when interacting with people, opinions are presented as facts. For instance, someone might assert his opinion about the market crashing as an irrefutable fact. Being aware of this distinction is vital. This phenomenon is common in educational settings, where opinions are treated as facts. For example, Freud's theory regarding sex as the cause of psychological aberrations was initially an opinion that evolved into a widely accepted fact in the field of mental health. However, upon closer inspection, it's evident that this "fact" doesn't universally apply to everyone, leading to the development of alternative theories.

This brings me to the point that it's essential to be selective when acquiring knowledge. In today's world of media and social media the knowledge and information is fast and readily available. Be cautious about the mental intake the same way you pay attention to healthy food.

The information intake takes time for the impact of that data to settle down, allowing one to perceive the world more clearly. The undigested food causes discomfort, unfiltered mental input can lead to various issues. Therefore, it's crucial to be mindful of the data we accept and its potential impact on our well-being.

The Importance of Direct Observation—examining things without filters or biases. Direct observation is examining things without filters or biases. Filters can include preconceived notions or stereotypes, such as labeling a community as miserly. To enhance confidence, it's crucial to eliminate these filters and observe situations, people, or information directly. Shedding filters gained through education, religion, parental influence, and friendships allowed me to improve my ability to observe things directly. Trusting your judgment and direct observation can significantly boost confidence.

The impact of upbringing on our actions—adhering to socially acceptable norms, considering what others might say, and how we dress. Identifying the source of such influences allows you to discard them naturally and gradually forget them. Understanding the reasons behind such instructions and re-experiencing those moments will answer the lingering questions and dispel the confusion.

I first emphasized that you must address issues from your early childhood because many unresolved matters stem from there. Regarding your specific situation, we can discuss it separately. However, I want to share a story about a girl who faced a similar dilemma because of the labeling she agreed to. She was unable to talk to her boss about a promised salary increase. When I asked why she hadn't spoken up, she explained that she feared he would perceive her as impatient. This perspective stemmed from trying to anticipate his thoughts and reactions and also the impatient title she got from her friends and family. It's essential to recognize and address such patterns to see what is actually there.

Delving into the root of the issue to understand its origin is crucial. However, be cautious not to get entangled in an endless loop while trying to unravel everything. Spotting the problem in broad daylight and acknowledging its source is essential.

Growing up, I never heard the term "tension" or "anxiety.". The first time I heard this word, I mentioned it to my mother, and told her that I am anxious and she promptly said, "I will fix it right now." She did fix it right away, asking me to snap out of it or else! Things got resolved quickly because there wasn't much room for such concerns. However, in today's parenting, there seems to be an excess of everything—over-worry, over-care—and it impacts children's well being. Parents often either entirely reject how they were brought up or strictly adhere to their upbringing. I advocate for a third approach, a standard way of raising children. It involves treating them as individuals, providing them with knowledge, and offering the same respect we expect as individuals. Respecting children individually ensures they are not insulted, humiliated, or made insecure by receiving too much or too little information. Gifting them with an ability of direct observation.

A standard approach to raising children is treating them as individuals. While some parents advocate being friends with their children, it's crucial to fulfill the roles of mother and father. Wearing both hats ensures a balanced and respectful relationship. It's essential to acknowledge traditional roles while fostering a friendly atmosphere. Another point to boost confidence is evaluating the data we hold. For instance, traditions like Karwa Chauth, where fasting supposedly extends a husband's life, might have been a solid fact for a while but can gradually dilute over time.

Similarly, reconsidering beliefs, like the Earth revolving around the sun, can offer new perspectives and answers to questions. It's crucial to assess whether the data we retain consistently provides answers or varies in effectiveness. For example, someone fasting for their husband's long life, only to see them pass away untimely, may prompt a reevaluation of that belief.

I have an amusing example to share. A girl on a matchmaking site was meeting many boys, and I suggested she create an Excel sheet to keep track of each person's details. This way, she wouldn't forget essential information and could make more informed decisions. She thought it was a very mechanical approach but it worked. Evaluating data and comparing notes from different interactions allows you to spot inconsistencies and make better decisions in various aspects of life. Taking breaks, assessing information, and relying on direct observation without filters are essential. This approach contributes to a more sorted and happier life, minimizing stress and health issues. The abundance of choices often leads to confusion so it is important to have a data analysis and direct observation skill. Observing and evaluating things is crucial to ensure they enhance your survival, bring happiness, and provide peace of mind. Whenever someone imparts information to you, assessing whether it aligns with the present time or is outdated is essential.

CHAPTER 10

Building Lasting Connections for Transformation

This chapter is on improving life conditions – a truly fascinating subject for me, as I've applied these principles so often that they have become integral to my life. When entrenched in a particular set of circumstances, people often fail to consider the possibility of change. Yet, armed with the knowledge that change is possible and believing that steps are to be taken, one can actively pursue a transformation in life conditions. Processing, or therapy as it's interchangeably called, is just one part of the equation. What we're discussing here is primarily about training. At any given time, you find yourself in a specific life condition. The crucial steps involve identifying the current condition of your life and then applying an appropriate formula to bring about positive change.

I would like to begin by addressing the condition of nonexistence. A situation in which you haven't been discovered yet and the circumstances are new to you. Start-up businesses or relocations to a new city or country can all benefit from this concept. The nonexistence formula is still at work when establishing a friendship.

Four steps make up this formula. Its systematic approach, structured in formulas, is significant. Observe the results of these four stages of this formula. My primary application of this formula has been when launching a new business. Experiencing unfamiliar territories without extensive knowledge about the situation presents a challenge.

The Four Steps of the Nonexistence Formula

Here is the nonexistence formula in four steps: communicate; make yourself known; discover what is needed or wanted; and finally produce and present. The nonexistence formula is based on these four steps. To ensure a successful application, let's examine each step in detail. Assume you are already in a position of power in terms of your social status. The mindset of a woman married to a successful man, for instance, is different from that of a single woman without an income. Existence is a condition in which you are present. As an example, we can recall our experience of moving to America. At first, nobody knew who we were. This is what is non-existence. You are non-existent in this new world. You may have come from a country where you were in the position of power but over here no one knows you. The right condition of existence is non-existent. Starting anew becomes challenging when nobody knows you. Let's consider a scenario where a girl wants to start a beauty parlor or salon. She has everything ready – the salon, tools, room, and the necessary licenses. Now, as she embarks on this venture, here are the steps she should follow:

1. Find a Communication Line: Identify a communication line, which could be a local temple, mosque, a popular website, or a Facebook group frequented by many people.

2. Make Herself Known: Once the communication line is established, make herself known. Share information about who she is and what services she offers.

3. Discover What Is Needed and Wanted: Interact with the community through these channels to understand their needs and desires. Find out what people are looking for in a beautician or salon.

4. Produce or Present: Based on the insights gained, offer services and products in demand. Ensure that what she provides aligns with the community's actual needs, not just what she assumes they need. If she neglects to follow these steps and hastily moves forward without establishing a communication line, the effectiveness of the process is compromised, and the engagement might suffer. By following these steps, the girl can effectively launch her beauty parlor or salon and cater to the specific needs of her target audience. She secures her first client, who desires to have her eyebrows done. Responding promptly, she confidently agrees to provide the service. The client visits her salon, and they begin beautifying the eyebrows. The outcome leaves the lady customer delighted, as her eyebrows have been skillfully attended to, marking a successful and satisfying experience.

The Condition of Danger, Emergency and Affluence

After successfully navigating the initial phase, she moves on to the following condition – the condition of danger (at risk). In this phase, as clients respond to her advertising and express interest in her services, the crucial question arises: Can she fulfill her promises? When a client comes in for a service, the quality of her work determines whether she sails through this dangerous phase. A satisfied client ensures her escape from danger and becomes a source of referrals, bringing in more clients and propelling her forward. An unsatisfied client can push her back to a condition of non existence hard to get out of. A condition of emergency is the next stage. Her growing business poses a challenge with an influx of clients. She must decide whether to hire additional help or continue working alone. She has progressed from the decision-making phase to the emergency phase after making this decision. The business runs smoothly once she has established a steady flow of around 10 to 12 clients per day, and she perceives it to be running smoothly once it has been successfully managed.

Affluence follows the normal phase. A large influx of clients brings in more revenue than the initial numbers. A desire to expand the business or open another beauty parlor started to emerge. She eventually moves into the condition of power as this stage develops. Having delegated responsibility to others, she is able to usher in a new phase - the power change. The following overview provides a high-level perspective on the conditions formula. Women seeking to establish beauty parlors, couples seeking to start a relationship, or couples trying to mend strained relationships should follow the same steps. Obtaining the needs and desires of the individuals involved begins with going out, making yourself known, and learning about their needs and desires. Once the requirements have been identified, the focus turns to producing or providing them. Anyone embarking on a personal or professional development journey will benefit from this fundamental approach. Even though this scenario might seem challenging, some individuals find it relatively easy, especially those who have mastered it. Business cards are a common way to introduce yourself to someone, but the real impact goes beyond that. Having a conversation with someone leaves a lasting impression on them. Now, when they look at your business card, they remember your face and our conversation. There is more to this than just exchanging information superficially. A good application of nonexistence ensures that people begin to know you more like a friend, leaving an imprint in their memory. It's about becoming a part of their closer connections, establishing a connection beyond mere transaction of information. During this non-existent phase, there are well-defined steps to follow, and there's no need to reinvent the wheel. The Pitfalls of Assuming Power Over Nonexistence

Consider someone who has worked in a particular field for ten years and starts a new job. In such cases, some individuals may take a different approach, like assume a position of power based on their prior experiences. A person with a decade of expertise may start a new job and, instead of recognizing their non-existent status in the modern workplace, behave as if they possess extensive experience. It is possible for this individual to dismiss the input of others and not listen to anyone if he or she perceives that they are in a position of power. Although they need to gain a better understanding of their work history, their status in the company is nonexistent.

It is unfortunate that such an approach often fails. People view newcomers as newcomers rather than experienced professionals, not agreeing with or listening to them. Due to this, their condition of nonexistence worsens and they are at risk of losing their new position. In reflecting on your journey, you don't necessarily have formal training in sales or marketing when you first get started; you follow the guidance provided. As you progress, you come across tools that, despite your expertise and confidence in their quality, could be improved. Establishing something can involve complexities, where the question is whether the product will be valuable and whether you will be able to effectively sell it.

Nonexistence in Personal Relationships

Suppose someone wants to improve her relationship with her daughter or son, especially if things are not going well. The initial step would be to reintroduce herself and make your presence known. From the beginning, "Hello, I'm _____, and I'm your mother. What can I do for you?" This signifies the nonexistence phase, a crucial aspect I've appreciated after applying this formula for many years. Likewise, when you encounter, for instance, the mother of your child's friend, and you wish to initiate a conversation with her, you should start by acknowledging the state of nonexistence. In this scenario, nobody is familiar with you, and the key lies in how you conduct yourself I've learned that the process of nonexistence, or understanding each other better, is ongoing. In our relationships, we tend to assume a position of power and take each other for granted, neglecting to ask regularly, "What can I do for you?" Then, the key is to produce and provide, whether for a paying customer or someone in your personal life, such as your spouse, friend, or child. The nonexistence condition should never halt; it should persist consistently in our interactions. Always asking and understanding how we can contribute to each other's well-being ensures the vitality and growth of our relationships.

It's easy to assume that everything is already known, that everyone knows everything. However, starting from the very beginning can often reveal surprising missing pieces. I learned this from someone while I was already well-versed in these formulas. She emphasized that nonexistence is an ongoing process; it should be ingrained in our lives. Every day, we should try to meet new people and engage in nonexistence with them—introducing ourselves and asking, "What can I do for you?" She stressed that in established relationships, the practice of nonexistence should be a daily ritual. This involves regularly finding out what is needed and wanted and then producing and presenting accordingly. Engaging in nonexistence daily, whether with new people or existing connections, is essential for personal and professional expansion. It ensures that every day, someone contributes something valuable to your life. And if no new individuals are entering your life, at the very least, continue practicing nonexistence with those already present. You might sometimes wonder, "Why do I have to take the initiative all the time?" Yet, that's the art – showing up and connecting, even with those you've worked with for a long time. Sit down with them, and approach it as if they're your clients. Say hello, inquire about how they're doing, and introduce yourself – not in the usual way, but with a touch of artfulness. Even with people you believe you're close to, engaging in this interaction brings a fresh perspective. It's like going into a state of nonexistence in your relationships, where, despite your perceived closeness, you try to exist anew in their minds. This is crucial because, to "sell" your ideas or products, you must be present in their thoughts and actively part of their mental landscape.

Embracing Nonexistence: Conquering Challenges Through Clear Goals and Unwavering Focus

Early in my career, around 24-25, my mentor challenged me to ask the time from twenty-five people. Nervous and uncertain, I ventured out into the crowded streets of India. Facing each person, I gauged their expressions, attempting to discern whether they'd be open to telling me the time. The pressure mounted, and I devised clever strategies, like entering a shop to casually inquire about prices before finally asking for the time. In the middle of this nerve-wracking exercise, I considered quitting after about one and a half hours. As a result of the fear of judgement and constant worry about what others might think, the experience was overwhelming. Upon returning, I expressed my reluctance to continue. My mentor, however, laughed it off, insisting that I continue my training.

With more precise goals and a focused mindset, my second attempt at asking 25 people for the time took only about 15 minutes. The difference was remarkable. The initial fear and uncertainty had dissipated, and I efficiently achieved my goal without the previous mental turmoil. This experience taught me the importance of mental clarity and goal-oriented thinking in applying non existence. During this exercise, my focus shifted from worrying about what others thought of me to achieving my goal of asking for time from 25 people. I had received training, and my objective was clear. I didn't dwell on the perspective of each person I approached; instead, I moved from one individual to another until I completed the task. As I entered shops, I didn't distract myself with price questions; my sole concern was asking for the time. This change in approach made a significant difference. When people later joked about the challenge, asking how many I had completed, I confidently responded, "Six," and continued asking the question. The atmosphere became light-hearted, and the task, once daunting, became a stable element in my life.

The lesson I took away from this experience was clear: whenever faced with a task or goal, initiating nonexistence—focusing on the task at hand—becomes a stable and essential part of my approach. Meet with people, ask them what they need, and then produce it. Give it to them. Now they know you. You are known for it. I want to share a part of my success story in the Bay Area. When I arrived in 2002, I had only $20. I managed to secure a job, but I was laid off within a month. This cycle repeated itself with another job due to the recession. Despite the setbacks, I held onto the certainty that the formula I had learned would guide me. Determined, I took a piece of paper and wrote about myself with a pen, offering companionship to those needing a friend. I created six flyers with a brief introduction and placed them in various stores. The calls started coming in, and I selected two individuals who visited me out of those. I applied the principles of nonexistence, listening to their stories and sharing mine. This approach paved the way for my immigration business, which is now 20 years old. Starting with just $17, I printed flyers and personally distributed them. Instead of merely leaving a flyer, I engaged with people, introducing myself and expressing my fear of failure. This sparked conversations, allowing me to explain my immigration services. Over time, my face became synonymous with immigration services in the community, establishing my name in the field. However, I realized that to evolve, I needed to step out of this comfort zone. Because I don't want my face solely associated with immigration, I aim to link it with the broader spectrum of my current business. In every venture, I apply the same formula:

- Find a communication line.
- Engage in conversation.
- Understand what is needed and wanted.
- Deliver.

Whether discovering new communication lines or revisiting existing ones, the process remains consistent—find out what else is needed and introduce it. Despite having around ten businesses —a feat not easily accomplished—this formula continues to be effective. I can start many more businesses effortlessly, and the same approach prevails each time.

Applying the Nonexistence Formula For Your Job

Taking a business example here, we can apply a similar principle for personal success. Consider someone who secures a job and thinks their task is complete. However, success in a career, like in business, requires a continuous application of nonexistence. Regularly evaluating what more can be contributed and introduced to enhance one's position is essential for ongoing success. A The easiest way to overcome introversion and shyness is to be open. You can begin a conversation by saying, "I'm introverted and shy." People are often understanding and may share their own experiences. Asking them, "What do you do?" can boost your confidence and lead to a supportive response. In the past, I have thrown myself into public speaking situations. My nervousness peaked when I saw a large crowd for the first time. The feedback afterward was positive, despite initial self-doubt. As a result of this experience, I learned that while training is important, first-hand experience is equally important. No matter how well trained you are, it's imperative to take the leap.

After attending a conference with renowned speakers, I challenged myself to envision speaking in front of 10,000 people. Visualization and setting challenges help me overcome nervousness.

Watching interviews with prominent figures, I visualize myself in those scenarios. Over time, constant exposure diminishes fear. Practice makes perfect; the more you engage in nonexistence with different scenarios, the more confident and comfortable you become. Start small, perhaps with your children, and gradually expand to more challenging situations. Remember, perfection comes with repeated exposure and the willingness to embrace challenges.

Applying the Nonexistence in Your Personal Relationships

It's essential to recognize that nonexistence doesn't always require engaging with strangers; you can use it to existing relationships. Even with those you already know well, inquire about their needs. The idea is to expand and deepen connections continuously. Engage in the nonexistence formula with your husband. Ask him directly about his needs, and you may discover areas where your efforts can align more with his desires. Despite handling various responsibilities like cooking, childcare, and housekeeping, practicing nonexistence involves explicitly asking,

"What do you want me to do?" This step highlights the importance of recognition and communication. In the realm of nonexistence, the outcome isn't the primary focus; instead, it's the process and the numbers. Whether reaching out to known individuals or strangers, the key is to keep pushing your energies outwards. Even with existing relationships, initiate conversations without the need for an icebreaker. You create opportunities for spontaneous calls or contacts by consistently outflowing and connecting with people. The magic of nonexistence lies in repetition and consistency. Treat it like an exercise routine, aiming to meet or communicate with more people each day. Track your progress as you would in the gym.

Consider expanding this approach to rekindle connections with old friends. Make calls, inquire about their current pursuits, and understand their desires. Emphasize the statistical aspect of this conditional formula by setting numerical targets, ensuring a driven and goal-oriented approach. Avoid relying on assumptions about their needs, even with family members or friends you know well. Directly ask them about their desires, extending this approach to a broader circle of acquaintances. By engaging in casual conversations and gradually exploring their goals, you can offer assistance tailored to their needs, fostering meaningful connections and keeping everyone around you engaged and alive.

The concept is to brighten up your field, making your area of influence vibrant. According to one definition, power is measured by how useful you are and how many people need you. By consistently being of service, whether for immigration matters, tax and accounting questions, or various other concerns, you become indispensable. People always turn to you, and your day remains busy with meaningful interactions.

This approach not only changes the conditions of your life but also contributes to a sense of fulfillment. The more you invest in others, the more purpose you find in your actions. Next, we will explain why that process, once mastered, naturally progresses to the next stage. Moving forward, consider the second, third, and fourth conditions as opportunities to shape and improve your circumstances using the same formula. Always remember the crucial steps: find the communication line, discover what is needed and wanted, and produce accordingly. Importantly, embrace the numbers game—expanding your outreach progressively. If you talk to one person today, aim for two tomorrow, and so on.

In every relationship, there exists a point of nonexistence. Perhaps someone knows you as a sister, but they need to be made aware of your expertise as a financial advisor. Initiate the process of nonexistence in these areas, allowing them to discover facets of you they were previously unaware of. This can lead to surprise and acknowledgment as they recognize the depth of your knowledge and abilities.

CHAPTER 11

Ethics And Morals: The Final Basis For Transformation

On the Difference Between Morals and Ethics

Morality can be seen as an agreement between individuals or groups, like a policy or set of principles. It exists in various forms, such as the understanding between friends or the principles established by an institution like a school. Different societies and cultures may have distinct moral codes, contributing to diverse ethical perspectives.

But people want to abide by whatever agreements they make because that's how society takes shape. We stick to whatever agreements we have made, and the community stays stable because of those morals. And if we do not agree to our agreements, it becomes an immoral act. A good definition of ethics is the reason why one should do something. Ethics is what we do for our survival. It enhances our survival. For example, getting up in the morning isn't a moral agreement; there's no rule saying you must wake up at seven or earlier, but it's suitable for survival. Another example is cleaning your teeth; it's not a moral agreement but boosts your survival. So, these two things are separate.

Weigh what is increasing survival and what is not.

When we make decisions, suppose there's an agreement between me and someone else. We're morally bound, but if that decision isn't good for the survival of many others, then morals need to step back, and ethics will take precedence on that.

So, in that situation, even if you break your agreement with the other person because it doesn't help the survival of many others, that is not immoral. It took me quite some time because I always wanted to understand right and wrong. People often ask this question, and we often need clarification because everyone decides right and wrong based on what suits them. If you find yourself stuck, thinking, "This is how it is, right?" you must consider and weigh that idea. Ask yourself, is it right based on my assumption, is it right for me, or is it right for the majority of people? For instance, someone might think leaving a job is the right decision for them. But if escaping the job puts the whole family in trouble, that might not be the right decision today. It's essential to think about what's right, not just for ourselves but for the well-being of the majority.

One needs to consider what contributes to survival and what doesn't. Take someone drinking alcohol, thinking it makes them feel better, and not caring about others. But when they drive, they put others at risk. They could harm someone, lose their temper, or damage their health. This is where ethics comes in. There might not be a moral rule against it, but ethically, it's not a desirable way of living.

In my profession, particularly in counseling, the definition of ethics emphasizes a strict code: not divulging anyone's information to others. This principle should extend beyond professional settings to the broader social structure. The fundamental idea is simple: when someone confides in you, it is crucial to uphold their trust by not sharing their information with others. This ethical framework includes refraining from offering evaluations or personal suggestions while in a listening role. The emphasis is on active listening without imposing one's thoughts or judgments. This practice, which I adhere to in my professional work, translates into the social sphere.

In essence, what I am highlighting is the universality of ethical principles. The standards that a professional setting demands—confidentiality, respectful listening, and refraining from judgment—are equally applicable and crucial in maintaining ethical interactions within the broader social context. The importance of ethics spans across all aspects of life because ethical practices contribute to survival. While no one can enforce ethics, engaging in unethical behavior can impact your well-being. For instance, if you divulge people's secrets to others repeatedly, your reputation may suffer. As people become aware of your actions, they might distance themselves from you or choose not to confide in you. Ultimately, the consequences of unethical behavior come back to affect you.

Morals are agreements that can change occasionally, but ethics are the basics.

Ethics cannot change because it has always been the same and has always remained the same. So then, coming back to ethics, I indulged in it. You must look at yourself first and bring yourself up to the mark.

This is my understanding because you sometimes need to figure out what to expect. I heard a story about Mahatma Gandhi. A mother asked him to tell her son to stop eating too many sugary products due to his sweet tooth. Gandhi agreed but addressed it on a different day. When she asked again a few days later, he said the son shouldn't eat that much sweet. She questioned why it took him so long, and he explained that he had given up on it before advising the son. I adopted the same approach, contemplating before suggesting someone to be a certain way.

In my research, I realized words like "honest" don't have degrees; you can't say someone is very honest. These words are absolute, either clean or dirty. It dawned on me that specific terms are absolute. And they do not have a degree in that. That's where I just pulled my bow to stretch it to test myself on that. And when you start testing it yourself on that tightly, and if you do a little bit wrong, and you see your survival goes down, you notice that so but then, in this run for survival, we just think that, tiny, whiny here there doesn't matter. When you scrutinize it closely and test it on yourself, even a slight deviation can decrease your survival. Often, in the run of survival, we tend to overlook minor details, thinking they don't matter much. However, I have observed that it usually begins with something small and gradually escalates—little by little and goes out of hand.

We can go into all the complexities, but these are the basic desires. Suppose you join an organization that requires you to lie now and then to sell a product. This forms a moral agreement. However, you feel diminished each time you engage in this practice, as it doesn't sit well with you. Even if it's an agreement and everyone else is doing it, it still takes a toll on your sense of self.

That's how I see it—a crucial phenomenon. Keeping things clean and organized might not be explicitly outlined in the organizational flowchart, but how you feel between a messy and an organized environment is significant. It's pro-survival for you. For instance, an organization might say, "We don't care about you after six o'clock; the job is done. You can drink, drive, whatever—it's up to you." However, following through and facing consequences like getting hit or caught becomes your responsibility.

Interchanging the meanings of moral and ethics

You can interchange the meanings of moral and ethics—you can make moral- ethics, ethics-morals, it doesn't matter to anyone. Whatever your fundamental principles are, they belong to you. When you transition from one organization or group to another, they have their set rules and regulations. It would help if you fit into their ways of operating. They tell you, "Here's how we do things in this organization." It's up to you to decide whether you agree with those rules. If those rules clash with your principles, whether you call them moral or ethical, the truth remains the same. If you don't want to adhere to them, you can say, "I don't align with them," and then move to another organization where your principles align with how you want to live. Even if you are not married to one person, you are committed to one person and are with that person. Still, when you are committed to that person, you are going around with another person even if you're not married, so that does not leave you feeling good, or your survival does not increase. These rules were established and followed mindlessly; everyone must comply regardless of who they were. But, the basic concept of freedom is universal. Universally, we share specific values, much like the idea of lying.

It's a universal thing; whether someone makes a rule about it or not, deceiving someone is universally recognized as bad. Even if there's a rule saying lying is acceptable, your body reacts differently. I've witnessed people lying repeatedly, and despite reasons to lie, their body gives them away – their eyebrow raises and their muscles twitch. I can tell their body is not in sync, regardless of any approval or protection offered for lying.

Ethics are inborn and apply universally.

Ethics are so inherent that they are personal and apply universally. Everyone experiences a sense of peace when they adhere to these principles, and their harmony is disrupted when they deviate from them. At such times, people invoke the idea of God, emphasizing that even if no one else is watching, God is. They seek accountability from someone who can see their actions and affirm they are doing the right thing.

Sometimes, if you're holding onto a belief that what you're doing is correct, it's essential to consider whether that righteousness benefits a broader community or just yourself. This prompts ongoing reflection on what is right and what is wrong. When we engage in lying, it involves persistently doing things that our inner selves disapprove of, yet we proceed anyway. Each time we do this, we distance ourselves a bit more. Sometimes, I encounter someone who claims never to have lied. They emphasize it strongly, seeking acknowledgment. However, not lying should be the norm. It's natural, like how animals and plants live—they don't engage in lying. Because they are natural, our journey is to become natural and return to our original selves. This is my definition of TRANSFORMATION.